

MOSLEM SCHISMS AND SECTS

(Al-Fark Bain al-Firak)

Being the

HISTORY OF THE VARIOUS PHILOSOPHIC SYSTEMS DEVELOPED IN ISLAM

BY

Abu-Mansūr 'Abd-al-Kāhīr ibn Tāhīr al-Baghdādī (d. 1037)

PART II

Translated from the Arabic with introduction and notes by ABRAHAM S. HALKIN

PORCUPINE PRESS
Philadelphia

First edition 1935
(Tel Aviv: Palestine Publishing Co., Ltd., 1935)

Reprinted 1978 by
PORCUPINE PRESS, INC.
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania 19107

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data

Ibn Tahir al-Baghdadi, 'Abd al-Qahir, d. 1037.
Moslem schisms and sects = al-Farq bain al-Firak.

(Studies in Islamic history ; no. 1).

Reprint of pt. 2, 1935 ed. published in Tel-Aviv, Israel.

Originally presented as the translator's thesis,
Columbia, 1935.

Bibliography: p.

Includes index.

1. Islamic sects. I. Title. II. Series:

Studies in Islamic history (Philadelphia) ; no. 1.

BP191.I2213 1977 297.8 78-3673

ISBN 0-87991-450-5

To the Memory of My Father.

PREFACE.

The abrupt opening of the translation with Chapter Four of Section Three is due entirely to the fact that up to this point the present work was translated by Kate Chambers Seelye, New York, 1919. The selection of that particular point as a proper conclusion was probably influenced by the consideration that it completed the study of the outright Mu'tazilite groups, whereas the remaining chapters of this section deal with groups which, while betraying points of contact with the "mother-sect", nevertheless display quite independent characteristics. Unfortunately, the book in its present form is still incomplete. The unique MS. which underlies the edition lacks two chapters at the end, as can be gathered from a perusal of the contents in Section Five on page 158.

To offset the very serious shortcomings of the Printed Edition, — a fault which everyone who has referred to the book recognizes readily, — the translator has utilized the following supplementary material: a photostatic copy of the MS. which was of inestimable value in establishing the correct text; the epitome, again incomplete, of the present work of our author, edited by Philipp K. Hirt; the recently published edition of our author's lengthy study of orthodox theology, his Usul al-Din; and finally, the Berlin and Paris MSS. of Isfaraini's study of heresiography which exploited our present work very generously. In addition, use was made, wherever possible or wherever they seemed plausible, of the emendations suggested by Goldziher and Brokelmann in the Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft, LXV (1911) and in Le monde oriental, XIX (1923), respectively, as well as of those by Casanova made in a private communication to Prof. Richard Gotheil.

In preparing the notes for the text, the translator strove in so far as possible to verify all statements, whether historic or otherwise, by checking a large variety of source material; to clarify all obscure or vague remarks; to illuminate more definitely persons, places and events to whom reference was made; and, in general, to make the contents of the work meaningful for the reader who is less than a specialist in the field. Altogether a serious effort was made to employ a maximum of supplementary reference material. The Introduction, on the other hand, is not the product of meticulous research, but rather in the nature of a personal judgment based on a comparatively long period of study of Ash'arite theology.

The method of transcription employed is the now generally prevalent one, found, e. g., in the Encyclopedia of Islam, with the exception of the j in place of the usual dj and dh in place of the d with a line under it. The reader will doubtless note that, owing to technical difficulties, all exact transcription had to be dispensed with in the Table of Contents, the Introduction, the Bibliography and the Index. It is sincerely hoped that this regrettable procedure will not prove a serious drawback.

It is a pleasure to conclude these prefatory remarks with an expression of gratitude and thanks to Prof. Gottheil who gave me of his time and advice, to Professor Gray of Columbia University and Professor Hitti of Princeton University who made valuable suggestions in the course of their reading of the work, and, finally, to my wife who was a source of encouragement while the work was in progress and participated actively and eagerly in the reading of the proofs and in the preparation of the Index. They are all entitled to a share in whatever merit the work may possess, without any responsibility for its defects and faults.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Introduction	I
Section Three :
Chapter Four : The Sects of the Murjiyya and a Discussion of Their Doctrines.	1.
Chapter Five : The Doctrines of the Najjariyya Sects.	9.
Chapter Six : The Jahmiyya, the Bakriyya and the Dirariyya and an Exposition of Their Doctrines.	13.
Chapter Seven : The Doctrines of the Karramiyya and Its Characteristics.	18.
Chapter Eight : The Doctrines of the Anthropomorphists among the Various Sects.	31.
Section Four : An Inquiry into the Sections Which Claim to Belong to Islam but Do Not.	37.
Chapter One : The Doctrines of the Sabbabiyya and Their Exclusion from Islam.	41.
Chapter Two : The Bayaniyya among the Ghulat and Their Exclusion from the Sects of Islam.	46.
Chapter Three : The Mughiriyya among the Ghulat and Their Exclusion from All Islamic Sects.	49.
Chapter Four : The Harbiyya and Their exclusion from the sects of the Believing Community.	56.
Chapter Five : The Mansuriyya and Their Exclusion from Islam.	57.
Chapter Six : The Janahiyya from among the Ghulat and Their exclusion from Islam.	62.
Chapter Seven : The Khattabiyya and Their Exclusion from Islam.	62.
Chapter Eight : The Ghurabiyya, Mufawwida and Dhammiyya and Their Exclusion from the Sects of the Community.	67.

Chapter Nine : The Shuraiyya and the Namiriyya among the Rawafid.	70.
Chapter Ten : The Hulhiyya and Their Exclusion from the Islamic Sects.	73.
Chapter Eleven : The Advocates of License among the Khurramiyya and the Reason for Their Exclusion from the Category of Islamic Sects.	87.
Chapter Twelve : The Followers of the Doctrines of Mesempsychosis among the People of Fancy and Their Exclusion from Islam.	91.
Chapter Thirteen : An Exposition of the Errors of the Hā'iyya among the Kadariyya and the Reason for Their Exclusion from Islam.	99.
Chapter Fourteen : The Himariyya among the Kadariyya and the Reason for Their Exclusion from Islam.	101.
Chapter Fifteen : The Yezidiyya among the Khawarij and the Reason for Their Exclusion from Islam.	103.
Chapter Sixteen : The Maimuniyya among the Khawarij and the Reason for Their Exclusion from Islam.	105.
Chapter Seventeen : Concerning the Batiniyya and Their Exclusion from All the Sects of Islam.	107.
Section Five : An Enquiry into the Characteristics of the Saving Sect and Proof of Its Salvation and Attractive Features.	158.
Chapter One : An Enquiry into the Groups Composing the People of of Tradition and Consensus.	159.
Chapter Two : An Enquiry into the Proof of Salvation for the People of Tradition and Consensus.	164.
Chapter Three : The Fundamental Dogmas on Which the People of Tradition and Consensus Are Agreed.	171.
Chapter Four : The Doctrine of the People of Tradition on the Pious Ancestry of the Nation.	228.
Additional Notes.	230.
Bibliography.	231.
Index.	241.

INTRODUCTION.

Abd-al-Kahir al-Baghdadi is an adherent of the Ash'arite school of theology, the orthodox party of his day. There were indeed the Hanbalites, under whatever name they appeared, who were even more orthodox than the Ash'arites, and minced no words in accusing the latter of heresy in matters of religion. But they constituted a minor group, of the sort which in all generations regards as its sacred duty the vociferous protest against the least semblance of compromise. It boasted several capable exponents of its position even in the days of Baghdadi, but altogether it was treated with disdain as a group of ignorant corporealists who arrogantly claimed to be the cultural heirs of the pious Ahmad b. Hanbal.

Without question the Ash'arites were champions of Orthodoxy, "adherents of the straight religion and the straight path". More than that, they were practically the dominant group in Islam. The day of the Mu'tazila was over. After they had enjoyed a brilliant career of some two centuries their star set, and subsequent defenders were only faint shimmerings of a more glorious past. With the passing of time the extent of Ash'arite indebtedness to Mu'tazilism became more obscured and its protagonists were discussed and regarded as a practically extinct party of wanderers from that truth which in the eyes of the victors preceded the errors of the Mu'tazila as it did every other interpretation of Islam. There were also the philosophers who were beginning to see through the inadequacies of both the physics and the metaphysics of the Ash'arites although at the time of our author they had not yet denounced the metamorphosed Aristotelian doctrine. But they were not at the time of Baghdadi, nor were they ever destined to be, serious rivals of Ash'arism. Even though they challenged it, exposed its errors and discussed its deficiencies, they did not care to undermine its position. On the contrary, they preferred (for very telling reasons) to leave those who were not endowed with higher understanding certain the untenable dogmas to which they clung; while they and the few elect would aspire to the truth.

The Sufis formed a substantial body within Islam in the days of our author. But they did not actively or officially oppose themselves as rivals of Ash'arite Islam. And while their starting point as well as their doctrines were far removed from strait-laced orthodoxy, it was as if a secret understanding existed between the two groups not to be publicly hostile to each other. Further, Sufi was a blanket term. By definition it could not really become a fixed creed, and as a result of that it included under its embracing title innumerable shades of opinion, some of which, it must be added, were extremely unorthodox. However, these latter outraged not only Ash'arites but even Sufis of authority. With the exception of these the others were accepted, some with greater readiness than others. Altogether the Sufis were regarded in a spirit of tolerance if not actually with an inner respect and reverence.

By the age of Baghdadi Ash'arism had become a fixed creed. The age of speculation was over. The formulators of the doctrine in all its aspects were deceased, and both physics and metaphysics, politics and ethics, eschatology and immortality were specific and exact concepts. It was still to be blessed with Ghazali, who was to leave his indelible impress on its theology, but that contribution partook of the intangible, it belonged to the realm of the heart. It did not alter the theology, it regenerated it, — temporarily, — with the dew of Sufism. And unfortunately the work of a Ghazali must by its very nature remain the gain of a few blessed souls striving for a more intimate communion. As for the mass of worshippers, the mystic strain of Ghazali could accomplish as little as the intellectual principles of dogma in deepening and revitalizing their religious experiences. The philosophic method at first employed by Ghazali in his exposition of theology did not alter essentially, or even appreciably, the component parts of the creed, while his later reversal which amounted to a stern rebuke of rationalized religion passed unheeded by a people who were much more cognizant of the results of the rational process, in themselves very close to the faith of the fathers, than of the process itself, or its justification. Even the Mu'tazilite influences discernible in Fakhr al-Din al-Razi's approach to some of the problems of Ash'arite theology, such as the Word of God and the immunity of prophets from sin, did not inaugurate a new orientation in Kalam. The work of its early thinkers established the principles of Ash'arite physics, metaphysics and ethics, and the system appeared finished to its adherents.

Baghdadi is decidedly an epigon. Ash'arism is no longer speculation, it is creed. Like Shaf'ism in Fikh, it is the straight road in Kalam followed by Muhammad and all good people since his time. Extremely orthodox in the practices of Islam, our author maintains the same unswerving position on the theoretical side. It has become with him an 'Akida, differing from the earlier ones only in that it includes even the corollaries of the main principles, thus becoming longer and more detailed. The creed is laid down in imperative fashion: whoever disagrees is either an outright heretic, a sinner of one shade or another, or one steeped in error. Kalam had so caught up with Fikh as to be able to reclaim its ancient name of Fikh al-Akbar, major Fikh. Like the legal Fikh it could be formulated and made binding just as the various books of ritual law were designed, deliberately or unwittingly, to conclude the developmental period and to establish authoritative codes.

Baghdadi lacks originality or depth even as an epitomist. He discovers no new principles, reveals no new ramifications from the cardinal principles, but seems altogether contented with the conclusions reached by those of his predecessors who became authorities in the Ash'arite school. Not that his exposition of Orthodox Islam either in this book or in the much larger Usul al-Din is devoid of argumentation. On the contrary, the bulk of the latter is mainly the result of a recital and a refutation of antagonistic views. But the calibre of the discussion is exactly what dampens the eagerness of the interested reader. It is mediocre in the extreme. Where an idea appears it is generally traceable to another source. Baghdadi does not hesitate to utilize the works of others, even as medieval writers generally had different standards by which to gauge an author's property. We meet with little philosophy in his presentation, which consists of a statement of the Orthodox position, a list of divergent views and a retort to the heterodox, on the whole annoyingly superficial. The result of comparing his work with those of some of his contemporaries is truly dis-treating. Over against the keen analysis and ardent refutation of Ibn Hanz, the lucid presentation of Shahrastani and the profound treatment of Al-Ji, Baghdad's handling of his subject appears ineffectual.

If in the face of all this Baghdad's work enjoyed such popularity that it was in turn abridged and recast, edited and translated, it is due in part to these very shortcomings. It is comparatively brief so that with easy effort a reader may obtain a conspectus of the vast field of Muslim heterodoxy and orthodoxy; it is elementary and superficial, challenging the reader's intellectual capacity to no great extent; it is factual rather than speculative and affords the reader a "catalogue raisonné" of all the disputed points; it is popularly written and only rarely falls into a cumbersome manner of expression. Perhaps in the same shortcomings we can also find certain advantages for the modern reader, since he too is eager to know the bare facts in addition to the philosophic background.

It is now generally accepted that in a sense the term Ash'arites for the Mutakallims of Islam is a misnomer. Ash'ari himself, a former disciple of Mu'tazilism who reverted to Orthodoxy, occupies a position which may only indirectly entitle him to the fatherhood of Orthodox Kalam. In his Ibana, a polemical confession of faith, he stands squarely in the territory of Ahmad Ibn Hanbal and makes an explicit avowal to that effect. The first temptation to treat that avowal as a means of escaping the charge of innovation, as we often find among earlier and later medieval thinkers, is hardly justified by a reading of the Ibana. It is composed in its entirety in a tone of unswerving Hanbalism, a restatement of the conservative Orthodoxy. And while in his large work on heresiography and on the orthodox physics and theology he does not display the ardor for polemics of the Ibana, we seek in vain for points of contact between Ash'ari and the school subsequently bearing his name. Perhaps Ash'ari's contribution to Kalam and his right to be called its father rest in the main on his method and not on his conclusions. Unlike the "salaf", the ancients, or his revered master Ahmad b. Hanbal, Ash'ari shows a readiness to argue and does not merely withdraw behind a blind adherence to text and tradition which allow of no argumentation. But the type of argument employed by him is not characterized by a philosophic, speculative approach. It is textual, deriving its decisiveness from the Holy Book or from tradition. Moreover, in adducing such textual proof Ash'ari insists on the plain meaning of the words. The Kur'an was revealed in Arabic for the benefit of Arabs, and the sole arbiter of the intent of any word or phrase is the interpretation common among Arabs. Ta'wil, or allegorization, is thus ruled out as uncompromisingly as by the Hanbalites. A statement in the Kur'an is adequate rebuttal, in Ash'ari's estimate, of a philosophic argument produced by the Mu'tazilites, a comparison of two verses apparently contradicting each other is a powerful enough challenge to a Mu'tazilite reconciliation of the verses. In truth, except for his willingness to argue, even when the array of arguments is lamentably circumscribed, one finds little ground for honoring Ash'ari with the parentage of Ash'arite theology.

In its conclusions and even in its method his school obviously abandons his position. While he, a renegade Mu'tazilite, was able to embrace the doctrine of orthodoxy with the extremism and zeal of a neophyte, his so-called disciples could not close their eyes to the trenchant criticism of the rationally minded Mu'tazilites, nor could they disregard the dictates of reason as fanatically as their master. Rationalism had at least established the right of human reason to be consulted in the formulation of theologic doctrine. If the group that regarded itself as intermediate between narrow-minded conservatism and devastating rationalism was to pretend that it could maintain its title, it had to placate reason, it had to perform just what the theory of compromise entitled one to expect: that it would prove the orthodoxy of old tenable even from a rational standpoint. As a starting-point, therefore, they found it necessary to establish the right of reason to participate in the discussion, to lay down the conciliatory principle that intellect was not ab initio hostile to tradition; that, on the contrary, as a creation of God it could be utilized in behalf of God and His revelation. If, nevertheless, there was much in the Ash'arite theology which later philosophers regarded as puerile and senseless it was due not to this premise but to the very idea of compromise; a situation, may it be remarked, which was destined to repeat itself when the later philosophic position was submitted to the dissecting scalpel, and in other cases as well, wherever compromise was the working hypothesis. But of this later.

The movement of Kalam, both in the hands of Ash'ari and in the hands of his successors was perhaps primarily a reaction against Mu'tazilism, but one which conceded the very important premise that a theory could not be expected to thrive merely on an obscurantist attitude of defying experience and intellectual activity. Kalam therefore found it necessary to go over the same ground as the Mu'tazilites, to examine the physical world, to investigate the ethical bases of society, to inquire into the person of God and His revelation to man. However, the Ash'arites assumed the role of apologists for the faith, defenders of Orthodox Islam. This latter point is what became so decisive in their theologic speculation. They were out not to discover truth, but to establish it; not to investigate the compatibility of reason and faith but to erect their philosophy upon a presumed compatibility. And while in these efforts, in a large way, there is nothing particularly unique, since they are ever so common, one cannot fail to discover in the specific character of the Kalamistic approach an aspect which does render it unique, at least among Islamic movements. So far as was humanly possible and in so far as their knowledge qualified them, the Mu'tazilites gave unchecked freedom to their speculation. The philosophers of a later day, particularly Averroes, philosophised primarily, and sought to force theology into a philosophic mould. No one can deny that in the process of conciliation as effected by Averroes or by Maimonides the theology of the ancients was treated more violently than their philosophy. But quite the contrary is to be found in Ash'arite Kalam. As apologists for Islam they strove most zealously to retain all accretions to the faith of the fathers, and it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that they manipulated the facts to suit the theory and juggled words to escape the necessity of formulating definite concepts or the discomfort of mutually contradictory premises.

In proof of the first charge their theory of knowledge and their theory of the physical universe may be briefly surveyed. Leaving aside the various classifications of knowledge, its division into divine and human, the subdivision of the latter into natural, or axiomatic, and acquired, the further subdivision of the latter into intuitive and sensual, we may dwell specifically on his analysis of acquired knowledge, for it is there that Baghdadadi exhibits his tendency to suit his theory to his theology. Acquired or mental knowledge is of four types:

- 1) Deductive knowledge, i. e., the purely mental process whereby logic and its ancillary arts guide one to the affirmation of such truths as the creation of the universe, the nature of the Maker, the admissibility of prophecy, etc.
- 2) Empirical knowledge, and deductive knowledge based on experience;
- 3) Revelation, which, our author explains, belongs to mental knowledge since prophecy on which the validity of revelation rests is intellectually demonstrable;
- 4) Intuitive knowledge with which some are inexplicably gifted as an uneducated person's appreciation of the technique of poetry.

Still another source of knowledge is the reports of others. The Kalamists list three classes of reports. The first comprises those handed down successively through the ages by credible reporters. The conditions required for qualifying a report in this first group (Tawatur) are that the veracity of the transmitters down the ages remain beyond suspicion and challenge, and that the first one to have told it has either seen it or heard it himself or that he has had positive knowledge of it. With these two requirements filled, a report of that kind is so certain a fact that our author does not hesitate to call it "necessary" because "doubt regarding it is as little justified as regarding knowledge derived intuitively or through the senses." Such knowledge obligates one not only to act in accordance with it if it is prescriptive, but to accept it as a fact. Examples of this type of knowledge are our information about lands which we have not visited or times which antedate us. The second type consists of reports (Ahad) whose transmitters are credible and whose contents are not contrary to reason, but lack an uninterrupted chain of transmitters through the ages. Such require action but not belief. We may cite as an example most of the derivative laws resting on reports of individuals. The third type (Mustafid) includes those which have had wide circulation, although they are not supported by an uninterrupted chain of authorities. If such a report is plausible, it obligates both action and belief, but it is acquired and not necessary knowledge. In this category will be included the reports of those whose miracles testify to their veracity such as prophets, or reports of those to whose veracity a prophet bears testimony, or reports told at first by trustworthy people and later circulated by many, so that they assume the characteristics of Tawatur. As examples of the last we may adduce the stories about God's visibility, or the intercession of the Prophet on the Day of Judgment, or the Pool and the Balance, or certain principles of Fikh.

With this scheme of knowledge Baghdadi succeeds in saving as gospel truth every shred of tradition and every bit of jurisprudence, every story of saint, every legend of the past incorporated in the lore of Islam and every miracle of the Prophet or prophets which imaginative minds throughout the ages have invented. In this alone we seem to feel the artificial nature of his philosophic set-up, the conscious effort to evolve a philosophy which will confirm faith. This feeling is strengthened by the additional fences which Baghdadi constructs: by the numerous conditions he sets up to make sure that none of the beliefs current among other nations, which Islam has for one reason or another denied, will lay claim to being true since it fulfills the conditions set up by our author; by the arbitrary rejection of opposing arguments. A few illustrations will make this clearer. A Tawatur report as we have seen, is one resting on authorities whom it is simply absurd to suspect of agreeing on a lie. Hence, Baghdadi continues to argue, the story of Jesus' crucifixion is false. The reasoning in establishing this is highly enlightening. Although the story about Jesus' crucifixion has assumed the proportions of Tawatur it goes back in the final analysis to four people who were allegedly witnesses of the event. But if there were four people present the Jews would no doubt have abstained from the act. It is told that thirty Jews were present at the crucifixion. Now deliberate agreement on this number is very possible and deliberate agreement on the weakness of the four against the thirty is certainly possible. Indeed, that there was someone crucified is true, but the question is whether it was Jesus. This whole involved argument is explicable on only one ground: that the Kur'an denies that Jesus was crucified but adheres to the teachings of the Docetics that some one else was crucified in his place. His virgin birth, his immortality — attested by the same book which bears witness to his crucifixion — are not questioned because the Kur'an and Muhammadan tradition have accepted them. Or consider the case of the traditionalist Abu Huraira, one of the most fertile minds and most generous contributors to the Hadith. Abu Huraira's veracity was contested in the generations immediately following his. That his traditions are accepted as the most practical expedient it is still within our power to understand. But when Abu Huraira, in company with all the Companions of the Prophet, is declared to be honest beyond the shadow of a doubt, while he who still challenges his authority is declared a heretic, we are working with principles of knowledge which fall far short not only of our theory of philosophic principles, but even of those which the medieval period evolved. Another illustration: Baghdadi establishes another strange law of knowledge: when a Tawatur supports a story which is likewise intellectually demonstrable it no longer possesses the force of compelling knowledge and of making it axiomatic. This is the way Baghdadi explains why the Tawatur reports about Islam have failed to convince all the non-Muslims. (This is also a splendid illustration of Baghdadi's naive conviction that he was operating with universals and of the genuineness of his orthodoxy.) Finally Baghdadi has laid down the thesis that Ahad reports are valid enough to compel action but not belief. Yet he immediately hastens to inform us that in matters of Fikh no attention is to be paid to the criticism or the divergence of the Dissidents. Why? Because such attention is to be paid in questions of Kalam but not of Fikh!

The philosophy of revelation may conveniently lead us into a discussion of his theory of the physical world. The Mu'tazilites developed a philosophy in which revelation became a necessary part of the order of the universe over which a just God interested in man's welfare holds sway. It fits in with the logic of their premises, regardless of whether or not the premises themselves conform to our conceptions. Moreover, they made an honest attempt to explain revelation, as indeed, miracles in general, without rudely disturbing the order of the universe. The ultra-Orthodox consistently denied any order in this world other than the ever active will of God, and for them it was not necessary to seek any other explanation for revelation than that God willed it and performed it. But the Ash'arites found themselves indisposed to join their forces either with the one party or the other. They did seek an orderly universe, they admitted the existence of one, and withal they strove to maintain their belief in the power of God to disturb the order and to interfere with its working, all on the basis of a rationally understood hypothesis. Hence they developed a view of the physical universe which strangely laid as its foundation the atomic conception of the ancients. Truly a wonder that the theory which served Epicurus and Lucretius adequately enough in their denial of God and the affirmation of chance was utilized by Ash'arite Muslims centuries later as the best vehicle for interpreting their orthodox philosophy. They achieved it by admitting on the one hand the fortuitous nature of the physical components of the universe, but by recognizing, on the other hand, the order which reigns in the universe. The result was a providential God such as Tradition had taught them to conceive. It was all done thoroughly on the basis of certain principles which Maimonides summed up succinctly. Briefly their conception of the physical world is as follows :

The universe, which is a term for everything other than God, is composed of substances and accidents, or properties, the substance being the essential part of every object, and the property the additional element. Substances are divisible compounds and the lowest irreducible substance is the atom, although it is disputed whether the atom possesses dimensions or whether it is necessary to combine two or more atoms in order that they become dimensional. Although the accidents are properties added to the substance, the separate existence of the latter is entirely abstract. Actually no body can be devoid of properties, especially of the categories of motion or rest, composition and color. Moreover, the apparent diversity of substance is due entirely to the properties. Stripped of those, there would be homogeneity of matter and even the four basic elements of earth, water, air and fire are further reducible as can be shown through the transmutation of one to the other.

The novel concept of Ash'arite physics is its view that properties possess only momentary existence. From instant to instant, — and, it may be remarked in passing, it regarded time in the same way as matter, namely, as reducible to an indivisible "atom", the instant, — the properties attendant on the substance perish and new ones are created. What brought the Ash'arite school to this conclusion philosophically may be read in Baghdadi. But probably, as Maimonides has pointed out, a deeper cause underlay their premise: the denial of causality. For, since there is no natural law which necessitates the existence of a property for as long as the object exists there is no other way of explaining why accidents should endure longer than an instant, — especially in view of the fact that some properties endure only an instant, — except by declaring that God creates a property of non-existence in the atom which makes it perish. But this possibility leads to an absurdity since it involves for at least a fraction of a second the simultaneous co-existence of the given property as well as its non-existence. According to Ash'arite theology it is not the substances which lead to the existence of properties but vice versa. Objects cannot exist without properties and the perishing of an object is due entirely to the cessation of creation of the attendant accidents. Now, having established the incontrovertible linking of properties and substances, and having, moreover, proved that properties are, and were, created in time, they demonstrate, to their own satisfaction, that the substances too are created. Since the entire universe consists only of those two categories it is proved that the entire universe has been created in time. One is duly impressed with their argument against the upholders of the hylic hypothesis which predicates the existence of matter devoid of, and prior to, properties. "Tell us," Baghdadi says to them, was the hylic substance originally one or more? If the answer is one, we can object: How did the one become many through the creation of properties? Properties change the quality, but do not change the quantity! If, on the contrary, the answer is more than one, then the objection is that substance cannot be devoid of agreement and differentiation both of which are properties." With that accomplished it becomes relatively simple, and convincing, that for a created universe a Creator is required, and thus the existence of God is established.

To return to the problem of cause and effect. The Ash'arites denied any relation between any two apparently interlinked incidents. The fact that two incidents always follow each other in time does not necessitate the conclusion that the second is the generated effect of the first. Pain follows a blow; falling follows a hurled stone; wetness follows the pouring of water. But in all these cases it is the customary rather than the necessary that we observe. In reality there is no inevitable relation between the three first actions and the three second actions, respectively. It is in these cases, and in each case, the result of an act of God, and it is admissible that at any time, if God should choose to disturb His imposed order, a blow will not be followed by pain. The principle of admissibility is another of the important instruments in the Ash'arite creed. Any thing which is rationally (although the philosophers have very loudly called it to the attention of the Kalamists that they mean imaginatively) admissible is a reality. Revelation now becomes exceedingly simple to prove. God disturbed His own universe. But with what violent treatment of nature and experience!

We have also accused the Ash'arites of playing with words and substituting them in place of a comprehensible concept, and it devolves upon us to substantiate this accusation. It is true that in a general way words had a more real quality in Medieval days. They were realities, and as such, an expression carried a real weight as something existent either in the physical world or in the mind. One may cite in illustration some of the arguments offered against dissenters. In answer to the sceptics who deny reality, the following "formidable" argument is raised: Is the denial of reality a reality? If they say, yes, they have admitted one reality, and if they say, no, the retort is: Since your denial has no reality, it is not true, and its converse — the recognition of reality — is true. Or, take the gibe at a representative of a group which maintained that every one who disagreed with it was a liar: Am I right when I assert that you are an honorable man born of wedlock? — No, you are lying. You are right — But nevertheless a distinction ought to be made between sophistry and absurdity. And it must be admitted that in at least two doctrines — although more can be listed — they maintain an attitude which, to all intents and purposes, is absurd.

One is the problem of God's attributes. Whether out of poetic imagination or ignorance of logic, Muhammad did not hesitate to employ epithets and descriptive adjectives in qualifying God. They did not disturb either his conception of God's unity with which he was no doubt intoxicated, or his peace of mind because of the contradictions which later minds, sharpened by contact with Christian theology and Greek philosophy, found to be "inherent" in such an attitude unless somehow explained. Even the first generations after Muhammad did not appear to be upset by it. To the numerous anthropomorphic expressions with which the Kur'an teems they liberally contributed their share of charming legends and other "traditions". But when people began to think they were compelled to define their terms more plainly. And when that tendency grew active it became evident that to apply rationalism to the problem of God's anthropomorphism and His attributes, and to carry through a consistent and honest analysis would involve a step tantamount to a break with the simple and direct language of the Apostle and the Ancients. Consequently the development of rationalism generated an articulate counter-movement sponsored by those who were the defenders and spokesmen of the early conception.

This was in broad lines the array of forces prior to the rise of Ash'ari. The traditionists refused to discuss. They paid their respects to reason with the admission that there was no comparison between anything applied to God and anything applied to man but they insisted very emphatically that all the anthropomorphic expressions, the epithets, the descriptive adjectives and the legendary material were really and literally true. They did not know how and they could not explain it; so they decided that they would not explain but would faithfully adhere to, and repeat, whatever was found in the Book and in Tradition regarding God and His attributes without explanation and without qualification, but always with the understanding that they were not implying any parallel and comparison with any human attribute or action. In consonance with their opinion these people frowned on translations of such terms into foreign languages.

At the other end we meet the Mu'tazilites. As rationalists they could not afford to seek shelter in an attitude expressible in "It is true, but I cannot explain". A stand of this kind, while perhaps reasonable, is not rational. Yet reason dictates that God be conceived of as absolutely free of any quality or qualification. For a quality, being something which describes, is added to the substance, and addition to the Person of God, Who is indivisible unity, is absurd unless we care to sink into the errors of polytheism. Moreover, description is delimitation and that again is equivalent to tampering with the infinite power of God. In view of all this, it was clear to the Mu'tazilites that there could be no talk of attributes as realities, much less of sensations and of physical acts or physical traits. If in the face of this presumption, a long series of verses appeared in the Kur'an which pointed to the contrary, confirmed and even augmented by statements and traditions of later generations, there were only two ways out: allegorization, where the authenticity of the statement could not be called into question, and denial where the uncomfortable statement might be said to be spurious. Some of the extreme traditions which were examples of crass anthropomorphism unless rendered harmless by being characterized as poetry — a process not very popular in those days — were simply discredited. In this act the Mu'tazilites were not really disreputable heretics since the struggle around the establishment of the canon of tradition is a historically established fact rendered even better known through modern investigation. Where denial was out of consideration there was the gentler treatment of "explaining away". Physical properties were spiritualized, anthropomorphic allusions were interpreted, and God's unity and incorporeality were maintained ardently and thoroughly. Some things, of course, are true of God. He is living, He possesses power, He possesses will. But what this means is either — as some Mu'tazilites believed — that this is the way God's Person appears to human understanding, or — as others believed — that whatever can be predicated of God is not in any way distinct from Himself, indeed is Himself. They were often violent with regard to the verses of the Kur'an but they defended themselves on the ground that since Islam was so monotheistic, there could be no thought of lending any other meaning to the plainly anthropomorphic words and phrases.

In this problem the Ash'arites attempt to play the role of conciliators, with greater respect for the requirements of tradition than for the dictates of reason. True, it must be remarked that in this issue, more than in any other, the Ash'arites renounced the teachings of their patron. His passionate arguments in support of the face and hands of Allah proved as unconvincing to them as to the Mu'tazilites. They, too, now took it for granted that even "bila kaifa" tactics could not rid the physical attributes of God of their unsavoriness to the intelligent person. They therefore followed the Mu'tazilites and explained those things allegorically. Furthermore, while they did not utilize the critical apparatus of the Mu'tazila and were consequently confronted with a greater number of traditions and statements, they applied the method of interpretation to these as well.

There remained, however, seven attributes in which they could not follow the Mu'tazila but chose to adhere to the view enounced by Al-Ash'ari himself. The seven attributes of God are: Power, Knowledge, Will, Life, Seeing, Hearing, Speech. Al-Ash'ari was rather consistent. These attributes, like the physical attributes, are realities. But a difficulty was encountered here which had not been present hitherto. What exactly were they? Were they separate entities distinguishable from one another, or merely different faces of the same coin? That al-Ash'ari preferred the first answer is a matter of course. And his so-called followers could not, if they were to remain faithful to their ideal, but defend the view of their predecessors. And herein lay their failure. Predicating the existence of attributes which were separate entities, while at the same time they insisted on God's Unity and freedom from composition and incorporeality, they were compelled to evolve the formula that "His attributes are neither He nor not He". What that formula means not even they could tell. It was an escape through words, which added little credit to them.

Finally there was the problem of human free will. Is man a free agent or are his hands tied and his acts only metaphorically performed by him? Both the implications and complications of the problem are not difficult to see. On the one hand the entire doctrine of reward and punishment ought to hinge on the solution of the problem; only a free agent can be held responsible for his acts and given his retribution. On the other hand, the assumption of free will in man creates the difficulty of defining the respective domains of power of man and of God and the further complication of the apparent exclusion of divine foreknowledge. The Kur'an, too, proves to be of little aid in unraveling the knot. It supports both views, and one cannot readily decide whether Muhammad tended, unless one grants here also, as has been suggested elsewhere, that it is historically wrong to seek exact definitions in the Kur'an. There can be little doubt that Muhammad was literally overwhelmed by the omnipotence of God and His participation in, let alone His awareness of, every human act. Yet Muhammad was not hindered from preaching the doctrine of human responsibility and of retribution.

This stand of the Prophet guided the Orthodox. They too believed and were not baffled by the contradiction. Both theses are true. Even the will to do good or evil is implanted by God in man, not as a general capacity for desiring the one or the other, but as a specific preference inspired by God now for a good act and now for an evil one. But just as God's power is a fact, so man's reward and punishment are a fact. This is the doctrine preached by Muhammad and this is the doctrine sponsored by his faithful followers. The Kur'an and tradition are the sole arbiters, just as they are the source in general for decisions of what constitutes good and evil. Only that is good which God approves of, and evil is what God abhors. To look for logic in the several component parts of this briefly sketched doctrine would be futile. Yet one cannot fail to be impressed with the compelling force of a kind of primitive logic underlying the entire structure: the inescapable necessity of bowing before the supreme power of an omnipotent and omniscient Creator. One can discover no other way than to accept what He offers, to believe what He tells us, and to conduct ourselves as He guides us by standards set up by Him and according to directions which He has revealed to us.

The solution of the intricate thesis along logical lines was attempted by two parties, each upholding the premise with which it was more profoundly impressed. The Kadariites, later developed into Mu'tazila, were the champions of free-will. On their banner was inscribed the motto: God's Unity and Justice, and in both cases comprehensible to mankind. We have already noted how thoroughly the concept of Unity forced them to deal with attributes. Similarly their concept of justice inspired them with courage and determination to premise certain axiomatic truths. God is just, and being just He cannot deprive man of his freedom and then hold him responsible for his acts. He can not, in justice, make man the powerless play-ball of a predetermined fate. Yes, God is the creator of the entire Universe, but He has willingly placed in the hands of man that domain of activity which consists in his deciding for himself what he chooses to do at one time and what at another. God knows beforehand all that will happen but He has willingly consented to limit His knowledge in the case of human acts. Justice requires that man retain the right to exercise free will and it is in his capacity of being a free agent that he can be held accountable for morality and ethical living.

Over against them we find the Jabarites, a comparatively small group impressed above all with the omnipotence of Allah and the parallel impotence of man. Only metaphorically may man be spoken of as the agent of any of the acts he performs, for in fact he is only the helpless instrument through whom God does what He chooses.

When Ash'arite Kalam took the field, it subscribed fully to the doctrine of the ancients. But unlike the ancients, it was urged to explain, to create a rational background for its stand. So the Ash'arites assume the reality of akseb, of acquired acts, presumably performed by the one consequently held accountable for them. However, in order to avoid the uncomfortable position of granting to man the right to perform acts, they categorically deny that man is the creator and performer. Quite on the contrary it is God who really performs the human act. The full weight of this contention becomes even more compelling when it is remembered that the Mutakallims also deny cause and effect, or generated effects. It therefore means that from the time the intention to do is created by God in man's mind up to the moment when the final results of the action become apparent through the act there are numerous single acts all of which are not only inspired but actually executed by God. They are thus faced by the dilemma of how man can be said to be the performer. And once again they rely on words. While creating the act, God creates along with it the power in man to perform that act. But that power is simultaneous with the act, nor is the act traceable to that power created in man. God is the author of both. What, then, is man's share in the act? In an attempt to clarify the point an illustration is given of a very heavy boulder which one especially strong man is capable of carrying. Now, if this man is aided by a weak person, the result is that actually the strong man does all the work. Yet the weaker one feels that he too is cooperating. But in addition to the general lameness of the example there is the further consideration that the analogy is not consistent. In the illustration the strong man is not the bestower of the weaker man's strength, whereas God is the performer not only in His own capacity but also in the capacity of the individual of whose power He is the Author. Essentially, therefore, the Kalamists are playing with words. Even if the explanation were restated to express the idea that it seems to man as if he were the actual doer and in that sense he is a free agent, it would be evident that we are deceiving ourselves with words, just as the ordinary man usually deceives himself. And the same dilemma is confronted in the discussion of good and evil or in discussing guidance or sustenance or the other topics which fall under the general heading of God's justice.

The foregoing does not pretend to serve as an exposition of Ash'arite theology or even as a systematic critique. It is rather a summary of the impressions carried away by a student of their theology. It must, however, be stated quite definitely that to the mind of the writer the failure of the Kalamists is only a matter of degree as compared with the efforts of the other rationalizing schools. More than in the choice of a particular philosophy or process of reconciliation there lurks the initial question of whether a reconciliation of any kind may be looked to to harmonize two such divergent realms as reason and faith. That there is an almost natural yearning for that peace on the part of those who are torn between the two or are drawn to both is an almost established fact. But the wish does not always generate its fulfillment — certainly not in such form as will prove convincing even to an unbiased onlooker.

The doctrine of the Ash'arites has enjoyed a long life and a stable reputation in Islam. But it is clear that these are due mainly to the particular history of Ash'arite theology: to a gradual overshadowing of the philosophic veneer, a religious garb covering the philosophic tenets, and an ever growing identification of Ash'arism with the religion of the ancients. It was the religious conservatism of the doctrine which saved the day for it rather than its philosophic presentation. The turbulent minds of succeeding generations were compelled to go to other sources. Those who found rest in Ash'arism were in the main neither great thinkers nor very seeking spirits. They were cut out to follow the religion of their fathers and were at ease in the pursuit of it.

THE SECTS OF THE MURJIYYA AND A DISCUSSION OF THEIR DOCTRINES

The Murjites are divided into three classes¹. One professes postponement in respect of faith and accepts the view of the Mu'tazilite Kadariites on free will². Its protagonists are Ghaliān³, Abu Shīr and Muḥammad ibn Shabīb of Basra. This class is included among those referred to in the tradition which has come down regarding the curse on the Kadariites and the Murjites⁴; it deserves the curse from both angles. Another class professes postponement in faith and determinism⁵ in works, following the views of Jaḥm ibn Ṣafwān⁶, and therefore belongs to the Jahmiyya. The third rejects both determinism and the Kadariite doctrine. The latter forms five sects in accordance with their divergences from one another: the Yūnusiyya, the Ghassāniyya, the Thaubaṇiyya, the Tūmāniyya, and the Manṣiyya⁷.

¹ Shahr., I, 104, lists four classes, adding to those here a group from the Khawārij. The combination of Khārijism and Murjism is odd and rests on a loose application of the term. The reference is probably to Shabīb b. Yazīd al-Shaibānī who withheld from pronouncing either Ṣāliḥ or his opponents (two Khārijite groups; see Ash'ari, 120—3) right, and was therefore branded as a "Murjite Khārijī", ib., 123. Shahr. himself calls Ghaliān a Khārijite, 106, and Makrīzī says that Thaubaṇ was also one, and was called jāmi' al-Naḥā'is because of his simultaneous adherence to Mur'azilism.

² Reading ḥalī with MS.; Ed. ḥalī ḥalī.

³ On these Kadariites see below.

⁴ This reading seems more correct than the one in Mukhtasar, 122, which punctuates between the two words ḥalī and ḥalī, since the author is dealing here particularly with Kadariites who are also Murjites. Ist. A, 46 b, supports this reading.

⁵ Reading ḥalī with MS.; Ed. ḥalī.

⁶ On him and his adherents see below, 13—15.

⁷ Together with the four Kadariite Murjites and Jaḥm b. Ṣafwān, our author enumerates ten groups. Ash'ari, who identifies Abu Shīr's views with those of the Yūnusiyya, counts twelve, including the Najāfiyya, the Karāfiyya, and the Ḥamīṭiyya (132—4). Bad' wa-l-Tarīkh names

They are called Murjites because they regard works of secondary importance to faith. Iṭṭā' (postponement) is employed in the same sense as Ta'khīr (delay). We say: I postponed it (ʿawjayitu or ʿawja'ituhu), that is, delayed it.² It is reported that the Prophet said: Cursed are the Murjites by the mouth of seventy prophets.³ —Who are the Murjites, O Apostle? he was asked, and replied: Those who say⁴ faith consists in a verbal confession, meaning those who maintain that faith is only the Rakashīya (see Naubakhtī, 9) the Ziyādīya, the Karīmīya and the Mu'ādhīya, V, 152—4. Makrizī, 350, names seven sects. In a brief treatise on the sects published by Deleury in Le Monde Oriental XXV (1931), 35—43, and written by one Al-Kirmānī, whom the editor believes to have lived before 525 A. H., we also find ten groups, but in place of the Jamīyīya he includes the Hanīfīya. If, 359—61, counts a sect Ubādīya in place of the Marīṣīya and does not include the Jamīyīya.

¹ Although the Murjites are treated here and in other discussions as a dogmatic division in Islam, the view is generally accepted that its rise is to be sought in the political developments in early Islam when the undeserving 'Umayyads became the rulers. Refusing to condemn them outright, yet seeing the injustice of their usurpation, they chose to remain non-committal. See Muk. St., II, 89—92; Macdonald, Muslim Theology, 122—7; Verlesungen,³ 73 f. Van Vloten, however, while not denying the political factor, would trace its origin to the friction between Arabs and Persians — the jealousy between them is well known. He also urges the recognition of a dogmatic standpoint even in its early stages. See his article on Iṭṭā' in EDMG, XLV (1891), 161—71. There is still an echo of the political basis of this group in Shahrī's report that "it is said that Iṭṭā' also signifies the ranking of 'all fourth instead of first and for this reason the Murjites and Shī'ites are opposed to each other", 104. Definite proof of their early political program is afforded by the recently published Firāb al-Shī'a of Naubakhtī, 6, although he also adds the dogmatic factor.

² To this explanation If, Makrizī and Shahrī add the element of hope also implicit in the verb. Makrizī, 349 bottom, calls them "extremists in confirming promise and hope and in denying retribution" المتشددون في الوعد والوعد والوعد في الوعد والوعد. Shahrī places the Wa'fīdīya in contrast to them, 16. Cf. Mukhtasar, 123, note 1.

³ This tradition — without an Isnād? — is recorded by Ibn Kṣayṣa in a fuller form: Two divisions among my people will not be benefited by my intercession. May they be cursed by the mouth of seventy Prophets: [they are] the Murjites and Kādantes Mukhtalif al-Haith, 97. In his article on Murjite and Anti-Murjite Traditions in ZA, XXVI (1911), 169—74, Kern does not cite any tradition similar to this one.

⁴ Arab. يؤمنون; Goldziher remarks that this verb, ist, wie arabische Gelehrte sagen, ist Kanya für den Begriff der Lüge. Muk. St. II, 51.

a confession and nothing more. The five sects which we have listed accuse one another of error and the other sects believe them all to be in error. We shall 191 now treat of them in detail, God willing.

The Yūnusīya. — These are the followers of Yūnus ibn 'Awn¹ who maintained that faith pertains to the heart and mouth and consists of a knowledge of, love for, and humility to God in the heart, together with a confession by word of mouth that He is one and there is nothing like unto Him². This is not dependent on evidence of prophets³. If, however, the evidence comes, then⁴ the recognition of their veracity and the general knowledge of what came from them forms part of faith, but a detailed knowledge of what came from them does not constitute faith nor part of it. They hold that no single tenet among the tenets of faith can be called faith or part of it, but that all of them together constitute faith⁵.

The Ghassānīya. — They are the followers of Ghassān, the Murjite⁶, who maintained that faith consists in a confession of, love for, and reverence towards God⁷, and renunciation of pride before Him. He held that faith can be increased ¹ Sam'ānī (603 b) calls him Al-Shamānī and Ash'arī (133) calls him Al-Samarī. There are several places mentioned in Yaḥyā, III, 132—3, by the name Samarā, but none of them is cited by the author as the native city of Yūnus. Shahrī, Ib., gives him the nisba Numairī and so does If, Ib., although he makes him his (or its) son. In Makrizī, 350, he appears as Ibn 'Umar.

² Some of the other authorities such as Ash'arī, Shahrī, and Sam'ānī mention as a specific tenet of Yūnus the renunciation of pride, only implied by Baghdādī in his word humility. Ibīs, acc. to Yūnus, is guilty of non-belief only because of his insolence despite his confession in God.

³ Adding عنه with Mukhtasar 123. Its conjecture that the second clause should read عنه عنه عنه now finds its confirmation in MS. and Ash'arī, 134.

⁴ Reading عنه with MS.; Ed. عنه.

⁵ Ash'arī, Ib., ascribes this view to his disciples, denying that Yūnus himself held it.

⁶ He was a Kafirite and his followers had their centre there, Sam'ānī, 408 b. Makrizī makes him a disciple of Muḥammad al-Shabānī and also informs us that he denied the prophetic character of Jesus (Ib.).

⁷ The other authorities also add the doctrine that belief in the Apostle and his law is required. The statements cited Ash'arī, 138—9, If, 360, Sam'ānī, Ib., Shahrī, 105, that a man is a believer if, for example, he recognizes that Muḥammad is a prophet, but does not know whether he was sent to the Ethiopians or the Arabs, serves as an illustration of their view.

but not decreased¹. He differed with the Yūnusīyya in calling every tenet a part of faith. In his book Ghassān states that his view on this question² agrees with that of Abu Ḥanīfa³. But it is an error on his part⁴, because Abu Ḥanīfa said: Verily, faith is knowledge and confession of God and of His Apostles and of what has come down from God and His Prophets generally, not specifically. It cannot be increased nor decreased, nor can people excel one another in it, whereas Ghassān declared that it can be increased but not decreased.

The Tūmāniyya. — These are the followers of Abu Mu'ādh al-Tūmānī⁵ who maintained that faith is what preserves one from non-belief, and it is a term applied to certain tenets. Anyone who neglects them in whole or in part becomes an infidel. All of them together constitute faith, but no single tenet can be called faith or part of it. He said: Any commandment, the transgression of which the community is not agreed in terming non-belief, is part of the canon-laws but is not faith. According to his claim, anyone transgressing a commandment which is

¹ So all authorities except Sam'ānī who reads (ib.) "can be increased and decreased". Makrīzī's reading "can neither be increased nor decreased" is an obvious misprint since he places it in contrast to Abu Ḥanīfa's view, as our author does.

² Reading ḥujj with MS.; Ed. ḥujj.

³ With MS. Ed. misreads his name as Ḥanāfiyya both times.

⁴ Our author, a thoroughgoing orthodox, is apparently eager to deny any similarity between the Ḥanīfite and Murjīte systems. Although he limits it only to this point, his silence about a similarity between Abu Ḥanīfa and Ghassān is nevertheless significant. Shahrasṭānī, more philosophically-minded, makes an attempt to soften the full effect of branding the famous jurist a Murjīte by modifying it to mean a Sunni Murjīte or by regarding it as a name which the Mu'tazila applied to him because of his views on Kadar. If, 360, goes still further and calls this claim of Ghassān libel, explaining it as a desire on his part to attach himself to a great man. Al-Ash'arī, however, a frank opponent of Abu Ḥanīfa, shows no hesitancy in discussing the two under the same heading (138—9), and similarly, Ibn Ḥazm, his direct opponent in Fīḥ, who does not hesitate to include Al-Ash'arī as well as Abu Ḥanīfa, Shiites, I, 29 and II, 8. Cf. Ghazwā, 103. For his doctrines see Makrīzī, 9—10; Abu Ḥanīfa, 33—5, and commentaries; these fully justify the view that he is a Murjīte. Evidence of the elasticity of the name Murjīte is given by the fact that Naubakhtī includes both Mālik Ibn Anās and al-Shāfi' among the Murjītes.

⁵ Tūmān is a village in Egypt. Yaqūt, I, 897, mentions it specifically as the birthplace of Abu Mu'ādh. Makrīzī names him a philosopher, ib.

not faith is said to have sinned but is not called an outright sinner, since he did not transgress it as one who disavows¹. He also held that one who strikes a prophet or kills him becomes an infidel, not by reason of the striking or killing but because of the enmity and hatred of him and the disregard² for his truth.

The Thawbāniyya. — These are the followers of Abu Thawbān, the Murjīte³, who held that faith is confession and knowledge of God and of His Apostles and of everything the doing of which is rationally obligatory. The knowledge of works, whose neglect is rationally admissible, does not form part of faith. They dissent from the Yūnusīyya and Ghassāniyya in making a thing rationally incumbent even before the revealed Law makes it binding.

The Marīsiyya. — They are the Murjītes of Baghdād, adherents of Bisr al-Marīsī⁴. In jurisprudence he adopted the system of Abu Yūsuf al-Kāfi⁵. But when he declared openly that the Kur'ān was created, Abu Yūsuf severed relations with him. The Ṣifīyya also accused him of error for it. When he agreed⁶ with the Ṣifīyya that God is the Author of the deeds of man and that the power to act is acquired simultaneously with the performance of the act, the ¹ That is, the sinner is in the attitude he takes to the transgression and not in the actual act of commission. See Ash'arī, 140; Shahrī, 107; If, 361. Ash'arī also reports of him that the Kur'ān, acc. to him, is an unoriginated and uncreated occurrence-in-time; the same is true of God's will and love, 300 and 583.

² Ed. ḥiṣṣ (a non-existent verb); MS. not clear. The reading chosen here is supported by Al-Ash'arī, 140: ḥiṣṣ.

³ Makrīzī, ib., names him successively Murjīte, Khārījite and Mu'tazilite, adding that he was called a collector of faults and shunner of good qualities.

⁴ Bisr b. Chayyāth b. Abu Karīm al-Marīsī (Yaqūt, IV, 515, reads it Al-Marīsī) is said to have been of Jewish parentage. Marīsa is a village in Egypt, Yaqūt, ib. Ikhāl, I, 260, seems disinclined to accept this derivation since Marīsa acc. to him is inhabited by negroes. He cites a report that Bisr was the son of a Jewish goldsmith in Kūfa (Mizān, I, 150, makes him a fuller and dyer). Bisr was a Ḥanīfite, nevertheless his views on the creation of the Kur'ān necessitated his concealment during the Khalīfate of Hārūn al-Rashīd and Al-Amin for a period of some twenty years. Ibn Ḥazm regards him as closest to the orthodox of all the Mu'tazilites, Shiites, I, 29.

⁵ He was Bisr's teacher and author of the famous Kitāb al-Kharaj. His full name is Abu Yūsuf Ya'qūb b. Ibrahim (Makrīzī, ib.; Makhtasār, 12, 125, note 2). Cf. Mizān, ib.

⁶ Both Ed. and MS. read the verb in the plural.

Mu'tazila called him a heretic. He was thus an outcast from both the Shī'īyya and the Mu'tazila¹. He used to say of faith that it is an avowal both within the heart and by word of mouth, just as Ibn Rāwandi said that non-belief is disavowal and denial². They both believed that kneeling before an idol is not abjuration but is merely evidence of it. These five sects make up the Murjites who reject both determinism³ and free will.

The Kadariite Murjites, like Abu Shīmr⁴, Ibn Shāhib⁵, Ghaliān⁶ and Ṣāliḥ Kubba⁷ differ among themselves in regard to faith. Abu Shīmr⁸ says that faith is a knowledge and confession of God and of whatever has come down from Him upon which the community is agreed, such as prayer, the poor-rate, fasting, the pilgrimage, the prohibition against the flesh of carcasses and against blood, and the flesh of swine, incest, and so on; also, a confession of the justice of God,⁹ His unity, and a denial of any resemblance between Him and any creature, — all of which is rationally known. By justice¹⁰ he has reference to his views on free will, and by unity he means divesting God of His eternal attributes. All this, he said, is faith. Anyone doubting it is a heretic and anyone harassed by doubts

¹ Irf. 47a, relates that he used to discuss with Al-Shāfi', but when the latter learned that he was partly in agreement with the Sunnites and partly with the Kadariites he said to him: You are half a believer and half a heretic.

² Ash'ari, 141.

³ Reading ḥalī; Ed. and MS. ḥalī.

⁴ This is the pronunciation given by Sam'ānī, 338a. Although he calls him a Kadariite, his views on faith are identical with those of the Yūnusīyya, with whom Ash'ari, 134, classes him in the discussion. Horten, Systeme, 304-5, places his death in 860 A.D.

⁵ Muḥammad ibn Shāhib was a contemporary of Abu Shīmr, Horten, l.c., 308.

⁶ Ijī, 360, names him either Merwān or Abū Merwān ibn Ghaliān, although several lines below he also accepts the possibility that his own name was Ghaliān. He was one of the foremost theologians and reformers of his time and became a martyr for his doctrines. Horten, l.c., 121-5. Nuhakīnī, 6, names his father Merwān.

⁷ A disciple of Al-Nazzām. Cf. Horten, l.c., 307.

⁸ Ed. ḥalī; MS. not clear. The reading here is required by the context.

Both Ed. and MS. read ḥalī. But, aside from the fact that the terms justice and unity are always applied to Allah, they make no sense with the MS. reading. Read ḥalī.

¹⁰ Reading ḥalī instead of ḥalī contra Ed. and MS.

regarding the doubter is also a heretic¹ and so on forever. He held that this knowledge does not constitute faith save in conjunction with a verbal confession. Despite this innovation, Abu Shīmr would not say of anyone sharing his views on free will who sinned that he is an outright sinner, but he would say that he is a sinner in this or that respect². To the orthodox Muslims this group is the most heretical among the Murjites since it combines both errors of free will and postponement. The justice of God to which Abu Shīmr refers is real polytheism because thereby he means to establish two great creators other than God. The divine unity to which he refers is a denial of attributes because he wishes thus to divest God of His knowledge, His power, His vision, and His other eternal attributes. What he says about his opponents, that they are heretics, and that he who doubts their heresy is a heretic himself, closely agrees with what the Sunnites say of him: that he himself is a heretic and that whoever doubts it is a heretic.

Ghaliān, the Kadariite, combined free will and postponement³ and believed that faith consists in the secondary knowledge of God, love of and humility before Him and a confession of belief in what the Apostle announced and in what has come down from God. The primary knowledge, he held, is innate and cannot be called faith⁴. In his History of Heretical Sects, Zurkān⁵ states that, according to Ghaliān, faith is a confession by word of mouth but that knowledge of God is inherent and is an act of God; it cannot be called faith. Ghaliān also held that faith can be neither increased nor decreased, nor can people excel one another in it.

Muḥammad ibn Shāhib held that faith is a confession of God and a knowledge of His Apostles and of all that has been revealed by Him: prayer, the poor-rate, fasting and pilgrimage, which the Muslims have accepted, and everything else regarding which they do not differ⁶. Faith, he said, is compound

¹ Ash'ari, 152.

² Ash'ari, 134.

³ In general he agreed with the doctrines of Abu Shīmr, Ash'ari, 136.

⁴ The first knowledge is that things are created and controlled, Ash'ari, ib.

⁵ One of the disciples of al-Nazzām. He is said to have been very well-versed in Theology. Arnold, al-Mu'tazila, 35. Ritter in Islam, XVIII (1929), 38.

⁶ With the exception of the greater stress laid by him on works, this creed is very much like that of Yūnus. Ash'ari, 137.

CHAPTER FIVE

THE DOCTRINES OF THE NAJĀRIYYA¹ SECTS

These are the followers of Al-Ḥusain ibn Muḥammad al-Najāri². They agree with us in some fundamental dogmas and with the Ḳadārites in others. On certain principles they maintain a unique position. They are of one mind with us in their belief that God is the Creator of the acquired acts of man³, and that the power to act is acquired simultaneously with the act⁴; nothing comes into existence unless God wills it. They also agree with us on the question of retribution and the admissibility of forgiveness to sinners and on most problems concerning what it is proper and what it is wrong⁵ for God to do.

They share the Ḳadārite views about divesting God of His knowledge, power, life, and His other eternal attributes; about considering visibility absurd⁶ and about believing that the word of God is created. The Ḳadārites call them heretics be-and people may excel one another in it¹. A single tenet may be part of faith. He who transgresses it is a heretic because he renounces part of faith; one can be a believer only² by adhering to all of it. Al-Sālihi held that faith is solely knowledge of God and heresy only ignorance of Him. A statement to the effect that God is one of three is not in itself heresy³, although it will be made only by a heretic. Whoever disavows the Apostle is not a believer, not because this is absurd but because the Apostle said: He who does not believe in me is not a believer in God⁴. He believed that prayer, the poor-rate, fasting and pilgrimage are acts of obedience but do not constitute worship; there is no worship except belief in Him, that is, knowledge of Him. Faith, according to him, is a unit, which can be neither increased nor decreased. In the same way heresy is a unit. These are the doctrines of the Murjites in matters of faith, and they are called so because they make works secondary to faith.

¹ Ib., 133.

² Reading ٧, although both Ed. and MS. lack it.

³ Ib., II, 3, attributes this view to Jaḥm b. Ṣafwān, Al-Ḳarrām and Al-Aṣḥari. See Aṣḥari, 132-3.

⁴ The tradition is related by Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, V, 382 top; Tayālsī, No. 242.

¹ They are called Ḥusainiyya by Aṣḥari, 283.

² His full name is Ḥusain (Maḳrīzī, 350, Ib., III, 2, Ḡhunya, 103; Ḥasan) b. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh al-Najāri Abū 'Abdallāh (San'ānī also adds Al-Rāzi, probably a mistake for Al-Rayy). He is said to have been a weaver or a maker of balances. He had frequent discussions with Al-Nazzām, whose disciple he was. In a serious discussion Al-Nazzām, angered by Al-Najāri's refusal to grant him a certain argument, kicked him and cursed anyone who would teach him anything. Al-Najāri left heated, caught cold and died. Fihrist, 179, and Maḳrīzī, 350; (the latter apparently from Fihrist).

³ It is this question which the heated discussion developed.

⁴ Aṣḥari, 283.

⁵ Reading ٧, with MS.; Ed. ٧, ٧.

⁶ Acc. to Ib., III, 2, Al-Najāri taught that His visibility in the world to come was possible but that he was not convinced of it. Aṣḥari, 283, and Shahr, 262, explain that he thought it possible only if God should transfer to the eye the characteristics of the heart, and then it could have a visible perception of Him.

them refuse to eat raisins in deference to Al-Zafarānī; for they believe that he relished them. "We shall not eat what he liked," they would say.

The Mustadrīka. — They are a group of people among the Najfīyya who believe that they have clarified what was obscure to their forerunners, in as much as the latter had abstained from asserting unhesitatingly that the Kur'ān is created. The Mustadrīka maintain that it is created, but they have broken up into two divisions regarding this. One argues that the Prophet stated definitely that God's Word is created in so far as the arrangement of these letters goes, but he believed it, when saying this word, regarding his arrangement of its letters? Whoever does not grant that the Prophet asserted as much is a heretic. The other division insists that the Prophet did not definitely state that God's Word is created in so far as the arrangement of letters goes, but that he was convinced of it and indicated it. Anyone believing that he actually said, in so many words, God's Word is created is a heretic.

There are some members of the Mustadrīka in Rai who think that the views held by their antagonists are all false so that if one of them said of the sun that it is the sun, he would still be lying. 'Abd-al-Kāhīr relates: I once held a discussion with one of them in Rai and asked him: Tell me, what is your attitude to my statement that you are an intelligent person born of wedlock and not of fornication. Am I right? He said: You are lying. This answer of yours is correct, I told him. He kept silence in shame. Praised be Allah for it.

* This passage is altogether unclear. The Arabic text is a follows: قَالَ ابْنُ أَبِي حَتْمٍ: "لَمْ يَخْلُقْ اللَّهُ حَقَّقَ اللَّهُ كَلِمَاتِهِ عَلَى رَجُلٍ مِنْ رَجُلَيْهِ حَرَوِيٍّ". Apparently it means that the word of God as recited and read is created, but that there is an eternal Kur'ān existing which God revealed to Muḥammad. Cf. Shahr. 62; Uḥ. 361; Systeme 148.

CHAPTER SIX

THE JAHMIYYA, THE BAKRIYYA AND THE DIRĀRIYYA AND AN EXPOSITION OF THEIR DOCTRINES

The Jahmiyya are followers of Jaḥm ibn Ṣalwān¹ who believed in the compulsory nature and inevitableness of our acts and denied altogether our power to act. He held that paradise and hell will come to an end and perish². He also maintained that faith consists only of a knowledge of God, while non-belief is simply ignorance of Him³. He said: No act or deed belongs to anyone other than God. They are attributed to creatures only metaphorically⁴. We say, the sun went down and the mill turned, without implying that they are agents or that it lies in their power to do what they have been described as doing. He further maintained that God's knowledge is something come-into-existence⁵. He ¹ Jaḥm b. Ṣalwān Abū Mūḥraz (acc. to Tab. II, 1924; Abū Muḥrīb), Maula of the Bann Rāṣīb, and secretary to Al-Hārith b. Surayj (Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 464) during the latter's governorship in Khurāsān, was a native of Balkh, but first made his views public in Tirmidh and for this reason he is frequently called Al-Tirmidhī (he is also called Al-Samarkandī). See II, III, 129; Sam'ānī, 145 b; Lisān al-Milzām, II, 142.

² Ash'arī, 289 and 148—9; Bad' wal-Ta'rīkh, V, 154—5 (Ar. 146); Usūl, 333; II, 362; Shahr., 61. His views on Paradise are reputed II, IV, 84. See Intisār, 12.

³ Ash'arī 132 and 279; Shahr., ib. As our author has pointed out (Ed. 190, above) his views on faith are those of a Muḥtāḥ.

⁴ Ash'arī, 279; Bad' wal-Ta'rīkh, ib.; Shahr., 60—1; Isf. 49 a; Cf. II, III, 23 top, and the refutation of the Jahmiyya on the remainder of the page and fol.

⁵ The reason for his theory is this: If we assume, that He knows entities before they come into existence, we shall have to assume one of two things about His knowledge when the entity is created: Either a change takes place, becoming a knowledge of something present and not future, as before, or He remains ignorant of it now that it is actual. Since both are absurd, we must grant a created knowledge. But to avoid change this knowledge must be created not refused to define God as a Something, or as the Living, the Knowing or the Willing. His explanation is: I shall not qualify Him by an attribute which may be generally applied to others, such as the existent or the living, knowing or willing, and others like them¹. But he described Him as the Powerful One, the Bringer into Existence, the Agent, Creator, Giver of life or death, because these attributes are exclusively His. Like the Kadariites he contended that God's Word is created and he did not call God the Speaker of that word. We condemn him as a heretic for all of his errors and the Kadariya declare him a Kafir for his assertion that God is the Creator of the acts of mankind. The several divisions of our community therefore coincide in charging him with unbelief. In addition to his blunders, which we have related, Jahm used to carry a weapon and make war on the ruler². Together with Shuraih³ ibn al-Harith he proceeded against Nasr ibn Sayyar⁴, but Salim ibn Ahwaz al-Mazini⁵ killed him towards the end of the epoch of the 'Umayyad dynasty. At present his followers are in Tirmidh⁶. In our time, Isma'il ibn Ibrahim ibn Kabūs al-Shirāzi al-Daili went forth to preach to them the doctrine of our in Him but in another subject. Shahr, 60; Cf. ib. and II, 127—9; Shahr. and Ibn Rawandī see a similarity between this view and that of Hishām al-Hakam, and al-Khayrāt grants it, but denies that Jahm was a Mu'azilite—Intisār, 126.

¹ Ash'ari, 280; Usul, II. Bad' wal-Ta'rih, Shahr. ib.; In Ibāna, 54—5. Al-Ash'ari charges that Jahm really meant to deny that God was knowing, living, etc., but that fear for his life compelled him to employ this explanation.

² This refers to his position in the service of al-Harith, who rebelled against the 'Umayyads. Cf. Wellhausen, I, c. 464 ff.

³ The name of this man is twisted. It should be Al-Harith ibn Suraj (Ed. and MS. Shuraih) who was a rebel governor of Khurāsān since 115 (ib.) and employed Jahm as his Kātib. ib. Wellhausen lays great stress on Hārith's Mu'azilite theories.

⁴ Reading Sayyār with MS.; Ed. جـ (Yassā). Nasr b. Sayyār, a famous general, was sent to quell the rebellious Khurāsān and subdue Hārith. Having failed to bribe him recourse was had to war. Wellhausen, I, c. 474 ff, esp. 485—88. Nasr was appointed governor of Khurāsān in 125.

⁵ Ed. جـ; MS. جـ; a brave soldier and faithful to the 'Umayyads. He lent his assistance to Nasr, and in the battle between Al-Hārith and Nasr, Salim took Jahm prisoner. His execution in 128 is told in Tab. II, 1924, Lisān al-Mizān, II, 142. From it Salim's great hatred for Jahm is apparent, no doubt because of his rebelliousness.

⁶ Ed. Nahnawend; MS. gloss. جـ. This is supported by all authorities.

Sheikh Abū-l-ʿĪsā al-Ashʿari, and a number of them have heeded his call and identified themselves with the orthodox. Praised be Allah for it.

The Bakriya. — They are the followers of Bakr ibn Ukht 'Abd-al-Wāhid ibn Ziyād¹. He agrees with Al-Nazzām in his assertion that man is the spirit and not the body in which the spirit resides, but he agrees with us in rejecting the belief in generated effects and in making God the producer of pain when the blow falls. He thinks it possible for a blow to come with no consequent pain or cut, in conformity with our attitude. But he adhered to some unique errors for which the entire community declares him a heretic. Among them is his statement that God will be seen at the time of the Resurrection in a form which He will create, and that He will address His creatures in that form². He also declared that deadly sins committed by Muslims³ are acts of hypocrisy and that the sinner is a hypocrite⁴ and a worshipper of the devil, even though he be a Sunni. He maintained that, in addition to his being a hypocrite, the sinner is giving God the lie and disavowing Him, and for that reason will be eternally condemned to the lowest depths of hell. Nevertheless, he is a believing Muslim. Then he pursued this heterodox innovation still further and said that the sins of 'Alī, Talha and Al-Zubair were non-belief and polytheism but that they were forgiven⁵ in accordance with the transmitted tradition that God looked down upon the warriors at Badr and said: "Do what you please, for I have forgiven you."⁶ Another of his errors, and one in which he contradicts all rational beings, is his assertion that children in the cradle do not feel pain even if they are cut or burned⁷. He thought it possible that they experience pleasure while they are being hit or cut despite the apparent

¹ With Mukhtasar, 128; Ed. and MS. أبي, Acc. to Ed., 16, he was a contemporary of Wāṣil b. 'Alā'. Goldziher points out the interesting fact that the Bakriya was a "one-man" sect. ZDMG, LXI (1907), 73.

² See Intisār, 144; Ash'ari, 287; Makrīzī, 349.

³ Al: Ahl al-Kibla; it is a more general term than Ahl al-Sunna and may even include the Khawārij. Jozy, Supplément, s. v. Kibla.

⁴ Ash'ari, 286; II, 229.

⁵ II, IV, 45, mentions only Talha and Zubair in this connection; but see Ash'ari, 287 and 457, and Naubakht, 13.

⁶ Ahmad b. Hanbal, II, 295—6.

⁷ Ash'ari, 286—7; Makrīzī, ib.

crying and screaming. Finally he erred in introducing into law a prohibition against eating garlic and onions¹ and he required an abluion after rumbling had been heard in the bowels². There is no notice taken of it in Fikḥ by the orthodox, contrary to the people of fancy.

The Dhāriyya. — They are the followers of Dīrār ibn 'Amr³ who supported our stand that the acts of mankind are created by God and acquired by man and that the belief in generated effects is baseless. He agreed with the Mutazilite that the power to act exists before the act. He even went further by maintaining that it persists before, during and after the act, and that it forms part of the one exerting it. He also followed Al-Najjār, since they both contend that the body is an agglomeration of accidents such as color, taste, odor and others of which a body cannot be devoid⁴. But he stood alone in a number of impious statements. He said, for example, that on the day of resurrection God will be seen with a sixth sense with which the faithful will behold God's essence⁵. He said: God's essence is such as none other than He can know, but the faithful will see it with a sixth sense. In this he was followed by Ḥafḍ al-Fard⁶. He also denied the Kur'ānic readings of Ibn Mas'ūd and Ubai ibn Ka'b⁷ and he argued that God did not reveal them and he accused these two Imāms from among the Companions of

¹ Ash'ari, ib., informs us that he forbade a person under such circumstances to approach a mosque. The law may be of Hindoo origin. Cf. Shiites, II, 76.

² Ib.

³ Like Bakr he was also a contemporary of the first Mu'tazilite.

⁴ Usul, 47; for further details of Dīrār's view see Ed. 196 (above 10).

⁵ This view, for which all the Murakallims condemn him, is quite acceptable to IH who, in stating that mankind will receive a special faculty in the world to come, adds; Some of those who profess this view call it the sixth sense, III, 2. See Intiṣār, 133—4.

⁶ He is described in Fihrist, 180, as one of the staunchest Jabarites and similar in his views to Al Najjār. Intiṣār, ib., asserts definitely that he, as well as Dīrār, was not a Mu'tazilite. The two are generally mentioned together.

⁷ The editors of the two, respectively, out of the four pre-Uthmānic recensions of the Kur'ān, Ibn Mas'ūd's Ed. was adopted in Kūta and Uḥai's in Damascus. For their lives as well as for a detailed discussion of the nature of their work see Noeldtke-Schwally, Geschichte des Qorāns, II 27—12.

error in their recensions¹. Another impiety was his suspicion of the common folk in the Muslim community, for he asserted: I do not know; perhaps the inner thoughts of the common people are nothing but polytheism and non-belief. He also declared that what we mean when we say that God is knowing or living is that He is not ignorant nor dead², and he drew similar parallels for all the other attributes of God, without establishing a meaning or deriving an advantage other than denial of the qualities by contradicting them.

¹ Shahr., 63.

² Ib.

CHAPTER SEVEN

THE DOCTRINES AND CHARACTERISTICS OF THE KARRĀMIYYA

The Karrāmiyya in Khurāsān form three groups, the Ḥakākiyya, the ʿarāʾi-kiyya, and the Ishākiyya. These three divisions do not regard one another as heretical although the other sects condemn them as Kāfir. For this reason we have counted them as one sect. Its founder, known as Muḥammad ibn Karrām¹, was banished from Sijistān² to Ghazni³. His followers in his time were the feeble-minded of Shīrāmān⁴ and Aḥshīn, and they came with him⁵ to Nishāpūr during the governorship of Muḥammad ibn ʿAbdallāh ibn ʿAbdallāh ʿAbdallāh. A part of the population in the rural districts of Nishāpūr followed him in his innovations, ¹ He was born in Nishāpūr where his father was a vintner (Lisān al-Mizān, V, 354, challenges this explanation of his father's name, claiming that it was rejected by the Karrāmiyya themselves. See also ibid., 362). He grew up in Sijistān and went from there to Khurāsān. Then he stayed in Mecca for five years until he was finally imprisoned there by ʿAbdallāh. After his release he went to Syria and from there to Nishāpūr, but was again arrested, this time by Muḥammad ibn ʿAbdallāh ibn ʿAbdallāh, and was detained in prison for some eight years. When he obtained his freedom he went to Jerusalem where he died in 295. He was a pious and ascetic individual. The Sunnites describe him as a person whose exterior is fine but whose interior is vile. Samʿānī, 476b—77a; Lisān, 353—5; ibid., VII, 149; Najm, II, 24; ibid., 50a.

² Ed. and MS. al-Mizān.

³ The common name for Ghazni, a district west of Herāt and south of Ghazna. Yaḥyā, III, 785; Muḥaddasi, 309.

⁴ Or Suramān which, together with Aḥshīn, constitute the two important cities of Ghazni. On the variants of the two names see Isakhrī, 271 and notes; and Muḥaddasi, 309.

See Yaḥyā, ibid.

⁵ Reading with MS.; Ed. with.

⁶ He was appointed governor of Khurāsān by Muḥammad in 248, ibid., VII, 77. It was he who imprisoned him, see first note.

and also a part of the weavers¹ and distressed ones² of the villages. The errors of his followers at the present day are so diverse that we cannot enumerate them by fours or sevens but we should have to go thousands beyond thousands. We shall only mention the well-known among them, and these we shall relate with disgust. Ibn Karrām urged his followers to ascribe corporeality to the Object of his Worship. He held that He is a body, possessing an end and limit below, where He comes in contact with His throne. This is similar to the doctrine of the Dualists, since their God, whom they call Light, is limited on the side which borders on darkness³; but is not limited in the five other directions. In one of his books Ibn Karrām has described⁴ the Object of his Worship as a substance, just as the Christians believe that God is a substance. In this vein he wrote in the preface to his book, which is entitled The Tortures in the Grave, that God is a Unit of essence and a Unit of substance⁵. His adherents at the present time do not permit the general public to use the word 'substance' for God, fearing demoralization as a result of its publication. But the application of the term body to Him is more demoralizing than the use of the word 'substance'. Their refraining from calling Him substance, while asserting that He is a body, is like Shāfiʿ al-Ṭāḥī, the Rāfiʿite, refraining⁶ from calling God a body while maintaining that He is of human form. No rule can be set as to the avoidance (of a term) when any one selected is bad.

¹ I. e. the ignorant. See ZDMG, LXV (1911), 360.

² Reading with MS.; Ed. with, Goldziher (ZDMG, ibid.), reads with.

³ Reading with Mukhtasar, 132 and ibid.; MS. and Ed. with. This doctrine has been especially developed by the Manichaeans, see Jackson, Researches in Manichaeism, 222—4.

⁴ An exposition of his views nearly as full as our author's will be found in Shahrī, 80—5. In addition to the similarity between the Karrāmiyya and Christians which our author indicates, Samʿānī compares them to the Jews, the Hishāmīyya and Jawālīkiyya (see next chapter) in their doctrine which ascribes a body to God, 477a.

⁵ Reading with MS. and ibid.; Ed. with; Shahrī, 80.

⁶ His real name is Muḥammad ibn Nuʿmān; ibid., II, 112 calls him Ibn Jaʿfar, but see Intisār, 147, and Skiffes, II, 29. Naubakht counts him, among others, as a supporter of Mūsā al-Kādhim's claims to the Caliphate, 66.

⁷ Ed. adds the word before Shāfiʿ which is not in MS., and is probably due to dittography.

Ibn Karrām writes in his work that God touches His throne and that the throne is a place for Him. But his followers have substituted the word contiguity (Mulāzāt) for the word touching (Mamasat) and explained: The existence of a body between Him and the throne is true only if the throne declines¹ downward.² This is the significance of touching, the use of which they avoid. His followers differ regarding the meaning of istiwā (firmness) which is used in His Word "the Merciful One sits firmly (istawa) on His throne"³. Some of them are of the opinion that the throne is a place for Him and that if He created many thrones alongside of the existing one and all corresponding with it, they would all become a place for Him, for He is greater than all of them. This view forces them to the conclusion that His throne at the present is equal to only part of His width. But there are others who say that He is no larger than His throne on the side where He touches it and no part of Him overhangs it; this requires that His measure be equal to the measure of the throne. There was one among the Karrāmīya in Nishāpūr known as Ibrāhīm ibn Muḥājir, who defended this opinion and took its side in discussions¹.

¹ Reading la with MS. and Usūl, 77; Ed. la.

² I. e., contiguity does not mean that there is another body between Him and the throne, unless the throne declines downward. Usūl, 10. On the distinction between touching and contiguity, Ist. Ib, remarks: "I wish I knew what is the difference between them".

³ Sura 20, v. 5. This verse which Goldziher has characterized as "the subject of heated disputes in Muḥammadan schools" (David Kaufmann Festschrift, 87) serves as an outstanding example of the cleavage between the literalists and rationalists. (A good illustration of this is afforded by the fact that in demonstration of the truth of literalism the six istiwā verses were posted on the mosque in Ḥamadān. — cited by Goldziher, ZDMG, LXII [1908], 8). The attitude of the Ḥanbalites and Mālikites is simple. Refusing to go the full length of the Karrāmīya they adopted the classic remark of Mālik's (see Ibn Taimīya, Rasā'il I, 432): I know that God sits on His throne but I do not know how (later adopted as a technical term: biha kafi'a). This was adopted as the official stand of the more orthodox groups, esp. the Ḥanbalites; see Ṣabūnī in Rasā'il Manīriyya I, 110—112. It is voiced most clearly by Al-Aṣṭarī, Ḥāna, 42—7. His adherents have more modified views on the subject. Baḡḡawī, for example, I, 327, vacillates between the two, explains "istawa" as "istawila" but adds at the same time that "men who hold views consider istawa as an attribute of God 'biha kafi'a'. Our author Baḡḡalī is still more moderate. He translates "istawa" as "Arshih" to mean that the rule was firmly in God's control; Usūl, 113. Ghazālī (Greenia 103—4) identifies 'arsh' with God's power. Even the Zahiriye Ibn Ḥazm forsakes his adherence to a literal interpretation and adopts the interpretation that God completed His creation with the throne (II, 123). This explanation is also suggested by Maṭarīdī, 17, though he himself prefers one similar to Ghazālī's (Ib., 16). Abu Ḥanīfa also believes in the throne as interpreted by the previously cited theologians. Iskandarī, 10—12. The Mu'tazila, of course, deny the istiwā, explaining it to mean istawa, "made himself master" (Aṣṭarī, 157 and 211—12, Usūl, 112; Ib, II, 122, 123). The most plausible explanation is probably Goldziher's that it is borrowed from the Jewish idea that when the Sabbath came He rested and sat on his throne (וַיָּשָׁב וַיֵּשֶׁב עַל כִּסֵּאוֹ). It seems therefore that Ibn Ḥazm comes nearest to the original meaning. For a rejection of the several metaphorical interpretations see Ibn Taimīya, I. c., II, 31 ff.

Ibn Karrām and his adherents hold that the Object of their Worship is a subject in which created entities exist. They believe that His utterances, His will, His visual and auditory perceptions, His contiguity to the uppermost surface² of the Universe, are all accidents originated in Him and He is the place for these creations which originated in Him³. His command to anything, "Be", they term an act-of-creating that which has been created and of bringing-forth that which has been brought forth, and of causing-destruction⁴ to that which has perished after existing. They refrain from describing the properties originating in Him as created or made or come-into-existence. They also hold that no body or accident is originated in this world without the arising of many accidents in the essence of their Worshipped One, such as the will to produce that existence, His saying to it "Be" in the manner in which He knows it is to exist eventually⁵. The utterance itself consists of many letters, each one of which is a property originating in Him. There is also the vision with which He will see the proffered object; if that vision were not created in Him, He could not see the object; also His hearing of what is created if it is audible. They likewise maintain that no accident perishes in this world without the occurrence of many accidents in ² The details of the discussion which took place in presence of Maḥmūd of Ghazna (who was their patron; cf. Macdonald, Muslim Theology, 170) between Ibn Muḥājir and Abu Ishāq Istarānī are related, Ist., 50b—51a.

³ Reading ḥaḍar with Ist.; Ed. and MS. ḥaḍar.

⁴ See Shahr. 81 f.

⁵ Reading ḥaḍar with Goldziher; Ed. and MS. ḥaḍar.

⁶ I. e., the words specifying what and how the substance is to be.

their Worshipped One. One is His will that it perish; another, His command to that whose extinction He desires "Become non-existent" or "Perish". This utterance also consists of many letters, every one of which is an accident originating in Him. The creations originating in God's essence are, from their standpoint, duplicates of the bodies and accidents in the Universe¹.

The Karrāmiyya differ regarding the possibility of the extinction of those existences which, in their opinion, originate in God's substance. Some of them regard their non-existence as possible, but most of them consider it absurd². However, both groups agree that God's essence will not become devoid, in the future, of the creations inhering in Him, although it was devoid of them at the beginning of time. This is similar to the opinion of those who uphold the Hylic hypothesis, that primordial matter was eternally a substance devoid of properties until the accidents came to be in it; it shall henceforth not be devoid of them.

The Karrāmiyya differ regarding whether it is possible for the bodies in the Universe to perish, and most of them think it impossible, thus conforming to those of the Dahrīyya and the philosophers who believe that the heaven and the stars are a fifth element which is not subject to decay or destruction³. People are surprised at the assertion of the Mu'tazila of Basra that God can cause all bodies to perish all at once, but He cannot cause some to perish while others survive. But this surprise is naught in comparison with the view of the Karrāmiyya that He is incapable of causing a body to perish at all. Even more astonishing than all this is the fact that Ibn Karrām described his Worshipped One as possessing weight. He has written in the Book of the Tortures in the Grave as a comment on God's Word, "when the heavens shall be cleft asunder"⁴ that they are rent asunder by the weight of the Merciful One pressing upon them.

¹ Ist. accounts for this strange theory by linking it with the theory of the Magians that when Yazdān contemplated that a rival might come forth in the Universe, He took it to heart. As a result of it corruption was created in His essence and He made Satan from it, 51 b.

² Reading 𐤊𐤎 with Goldziher, Ed. and MS.; 𐤊𐤎, both phrases, see Usūl, 50 and the refutation of this view, 52; from Ist. ib. we can gather that in general they held it to be absurd: the objects that will make an object existent and non-existent at the same time. See Shahr, 82--3.

³ The Orthodox doctrine is stated Ed. 319 and 338 (below 181 and 208).
⁴ Sura 82, v. 1.

Ibn Karrām and the majority of his adherents believe that God has been eternally qualified by the names derived by philologists from His acts, despite the absurdity of the eternal existence of acts. He has been eternally a creator, sustainer and benefactor, even without the existence of acts of creation, sustenance and benefit. He has been eternally a creator because of a creative faculty (Kāfiyya) in Him, and sustainer, because of a sustaining faculty (Rāziyya) in Him. They explain His creative faculty to mean His power to create and His sustaining faculty as the power to grant sustenance. This power is eternal, whereas the acts of creating and sustaining originate in Him in time through this power of His. They say: By the act-of-creation the created object in the Universe becomes created, and by the act-of-sustaining the sustained one is sustained. Even more astonishing than this is their distinction between the Speaker (Mutakallim) and the Sayer (Kā'il) and, similarly, between the Word and the Utterance. For they say: Verily, God has ever been a Speaker and a Sayer, but they distinguish between the meaning of the two names. They teach that He has always been a Speaker because of a Word, which is His power-to-utter, and He has been eternally a Sayer because of a faculty-to-utter (Kā'iliyya) and not because of the utterance¹. His faculty to utter is His power-to-utter, but His utterance consists of letters originating in Him. The utterance of God, according to them, is therefore created in Him, but His Word is eternal².

'Abd al-Kāfir relates: I discussed this point with one of them and said to him: Since you are of the opinion that the Word is the power-to-utter, and the silent person in his state of silence is, according to you, capable of uttering, you are therefore forced to admit that the silent person is a speaker. He admitted it. Among the subtleties of the Karrāmiyya in this connection is their following argument: We admit, generally speaking, that God has been eternally a creator and a sustainer, but we do not admit that He has never ceased to create the created and sustain the sustained in a particular relation. We recognize this relation only from the time when the created objects or the sustained objects already existed. By analogy with this, they maintain that God never ceased to be worshipped but He has not been eternally worshipped by worshippers, becoming so only when the worshippers and their worship came into existence. Ibn Karrām in his Book of the Tortures in the Grave prefixes a certain chapter with an astonishing title, calling it "A Chapter on the 'Qualitness' (كَيْفِيَّةٌ) of God". The intelligent person does not know what to wonder at, whether at his audacity in accepting without reserve the word qualifying as an attribute of God or at his vileness in expressing quality by qualitness. He has a number of examples of this sort of usage, among which we find his statement in the section entitled Refutation of the Traditionists on Faith which reads as follows: "If their books (مُؤَلَّفَاتُهُمْ) should say, faith is word and deed, we shall say to them so and so". In the same way he has designated in one of his books the place of the Object of his Worship by the term ubiquitousness (كُلِّيَّةٌ). These ugly expressions match his ugly doctrine¹.

¹ Reading 𐤊𐤎 with MS.; Ed. 𐤊𐤎.
² Ist. 52 b.; See El, II, 773.

He and his followers, in discussing the objects of God's power, maintain that His power extends only over those created objects which are brought forth in His essence, such as His will, His utterances. His perceptions, and His continuity to that with which He comes in contact. But the created bodies and properties in the world are in no way the objects of God's power, nor does His power extend over them all despite their created state. For He created every being in the world with His utterance "Be" and not with His power. In this innovation they have no predecessors. True, people before them have differed regarding the powers of God. Thus the Orthodox say² that every created being is the object of God's power before it was brought forth, He being the originator with His power, of all originated entities³. Muḥammad held that all bodies are the objects of God's power before He created them but that the accidents are neither created by Him nor objects of His power. Most of the Mutazila assert that bodies, colors, tastes, smells, and the other types of accidents are objects of God's power, but they withhold from describing Him as possessing power over the objects of power ascribed to beings other than He⁴. The Ishmīyā say: All things brought forth are the objects of God's power and there is no possessor of power and no agent other than He¹. But no one before the Karrāmiyya spoke about the limitation of God's power to created objects which originate in His essence, according to them. Far be God from their views.

In the field of God's justice and injustice² they have also proposed some astonishing theses. One of them is that the first entity which God created must have necessarily been a living body, endowed with reason³. They maintain that 209 if He had begun by creating inanimate objects He would not be wise. In this heresy they exceed the Kadariyya and their contention that there are certainly created beings for whom it is reasonable to assume understanding, but that the first creation need not necessarily have been a living being endowed with reason. With this heresy they have repudiated true tradition to the effect that the first things which He created were the Tablet and the Pen; then He made the Pen trace upon the Tablet all that will take place on the day of resurrection⁴. They maintain that if God had created mankind while knowing that not one of them would believe in Him, His creation would have been a sport. But it pleased Him to create all of them because He knew that some of them would believe in Him. The Orthodox retort that if He had created the unbelievers and not the believers, or if He had created the believers and not the infidels, it would still have been possible, and would not have impugned His justice⁵. The Karrāmiyya maintain that God's justice does not allow the deprivation of the lives of children about whom He knows that if He spared them to the time of their maturity they would be believers⁶. Nor is it right of Him to bring death upon an infidel who, if he had been spared for a period of time, would have become a believer unless an act of righteousness to someone else is involved in the premature death which he brings upon him⁷. By this doctrine they are compelled to admit

¹ Ib. 52a; Id. adds a few more examples.

² Adding جس after الشيء with MS.; missing in Ed.

³ Ed. 322-3 (below 185-6).

⁴ Referring to the controversy over human acts (al-ḥaṣṣa), see Ed. 327-8

¹ Ed. 199 (above 13).

² Reading الشيء with MS.; Ed. الشيء.

³ Ib. 362.

⁴ This tradition which Goldziher, who discusses it in Z4, XXII (1908), 321, calls "ein sehr verstelltes Hadīth" is recorded with various readings in Tab. I, 29-38.

⁵ This is expounded more fully Ed. 331 (below 198-9).

⁶ Ash'ari, 250.

⁷ Ib. and 249-50.

that God must have caused the death of Ibrahim, the son of the Prophet, before his maturity, because He knew that if He had spared him he would not have been a believer¹. In this way they slander all children of prophets, who died prematurely.

Among their follies on the subject of prophecy and the apostolate is their belief that prophecy and apostleship are two attributes inherent in the prophet or the apostle; they are not the revelation to him, nor his miracles nor his immunity from sin. They hold that everyone who is affected by this attribute must necessarily be sent by God². They distinguish between the apostle and the sent one in that the apostle is he in whom that attribute inheres, and the sent one is he who is charged with carrying the apostleship into execution. They next occupy themselves with the problem of the prophets' immunity from sin. They teach that they are immune from every sin which disqualifies them from giving testimony or which renders punishment necessary, but they are not immune from lesser sins³. Some of them say that they cannot possibly sin while conveying the message, but others think it admissible. They believe that the Prophet was guilty of a lapse in delivering His Word: "And Manā is the third, the last"⁴ and in adding: "These are the exalted females whose intercession is to be sought after". The orthodox explain that this word was an interpolation by Satan who interpolated it between the parts of the Prophet's sermon. Our sheikh, Abū-l-Ḥasan al-Ash'arī, has asserted in one of his books that after the descent of prophecy upon them, prophets are immune from both deadly and minor sins.

The Karrāmiyya also believe that when a prophet's call is announced, it is incumbent upon everyone who hears it from him, or upon everyone whom a

¹ See Muh. St., II, 103—6.

² Ist. 53 a contends that by this definition they deny to the Prophet the acquired acts on the merit of which he becomes worthy of prophecy and thus deny his reward. In Ibn Karrām's entire heretical conception of prophecy and apostleship Tor Andrae would recognize the θεός ἀπόστολος of the Pneumatics. Die Person Muhammads, 202—4.

³ On the question of the prophets' immunity from sin see Ed. 333 (below 201—2).

⁴ Sura 53, v. 20. The second half of the verse cited in the Text does not occur in the Kur'ān; but see Lane, s. v. ج. ج. An elucidating discussion of the entire problem in connection with this verse will now be found in Tor Andrae's recently published Mohammed sein Leben und Glaube, 14—19.

report of him reaches, to put his trust in him and to confess his belief in him without waiting for a recognition of his proof¹. They stole this innovation from the Ikāwīya among the Khawārij who argue that the prophet's utterance about himself: "I am a prophet" is in itself² proof which requires no other sign³. The Karrāmiyya further hold that one whom the call of the prophet has not reached is bound to believe the rational axioms and to believe that God sends messengers to mankind⁴. Most of the Kadariyya have already anticipated them in the view regarding the necessity of believing in certain rational principles, but no one before them has declared that it is necessary to believe in the existence of prophets before reports of their existence have arrived. The Karrāmiyya also maintain that if God had confined the charge unto mankind to one messenger from the beginning of time to the Day of Judgment, and continued the law of the first messenger, He would not be just. The Sunnites reply that if God had done this it would be admissible just as the law of the Seal of the Prophets to His community until the Day of Judgment is admissible.

Ibn Karrām tackled next the question of the Imāmate. He allowed the incumbency of two Imāms at the same time despite the ensuing quarrels, the engagements in battle, and the divergences in law⁵. He uses as proof the fact that both 'Alī and Mu'āwiya were Imāms at the same time⁶. The adherents of each of the two were obliged to obey the other even though one of them was just and the other a usurper. His followers say that 'Alī was the Imām in conformity to the Sunna, while Mu'āwiya was an Imām in contradiction to the Sunna, yet it was the duty of the followers of each of them to obey the other. Is there anything more wonderful than the duty to obey something that contradicts the Sunna?

The Karrāmiyya also attacked the problem of faith. They hold that it

¹ For the relations between this view and a possible skepticism about prophetic miracles see Andrae, Person Muhammads, 115—16.

² Reading "و" with MS; Ed. "و".

³ Ed. 86.

⁴ Shahr., 84.

⁵ Shahr., 85; Iḥ. 363; Usūl, 274.

⁶ For the Orthodox attitude to this phenomenon see Ed. 342 (below 214).

consists only of a single confession made at the beginning of time. Its repetition is not regarded as an act of faith except from an apostate who confesses it after his apostasy¹. They maintain that it is the confession which was made for the first time by the offspring from the loins² of the Prophet when they declared:

212 Certainly³. They believe that this declaration endures forever, becoming ineffective only in case of apostasy. They also believe that he who confesses in both parts of the Shahāda is a believer even if he is a convinced heretic with respect to the apostleship⁴. They also hold that the hypocrites, concerning whose disbelief God has revealed many verses in which He condemns them as infidels, are believers indeed and that their faith is as pure as that of the prophets and the angels⁵. Regarding the people of fancy who oppose their views as well as the views of the Sunnites they teach that their punishments in the world to come are not eternal. In truth, however, the people of fancy will witness the perpetual sufferings of the Karrāmiyya in hell.

Ibn Karrām further introduced stupidities without precedent in the Fikh. Among them is his statement that it is sufficient for the traveller⁶ to say the Allāh Akbar twice without kneeling, bowing, standing, sitting or reciting the Shahāda or the Salutation⁷; also his declaration that it is proper to offer prayer in dirty clothes and on dirty ground and with a dirty body⁸. Yet he required ablutions for Al-ha'ith and not for *Anjās*⁹. He also ruled that the washing of the dead and prayer after them are customs not ordained by law. What is obligatory consists merely in shrouding and burying them¹. He also recognized the validity of prayer, fasting, or the pilgrimage unaccompanied by concentration², maintaining that the devotion inherent in Islam since its beginning compensates for the devotion required with every commandment in Islam.

In our time a sheikh of the Karrāmiyya, Ibrahim ibn Muḥajir by name, has devised unprecedented errors. He believes that all of God's names are accidents in Him and, similarly, the name of anyone who is designated by it is an accident within the bearer. He holds that the name Allāh is an accident inhering in a primordial body, Al-Rahmān (the Merciful One) a second accident, Al-Rahīm (the Compassionate) a third, and Al-Khāliq (the Creator) a fourth. Thus every name of God is an accident distinct from the other. Allāh, in his view, is not Al-Rahmān, and Al-Rahmān is not Al-Rahīm, and Al-Khāliq is not Al-Rahīm (the Sustainer). He holds further that "adulterer" is an accident in a body to which adultery is attributed and, similarly, "thief" is an accident in one against whom a charge of theft is made. But the body is neither adulterer nor thief. The flogged or amputated person, according to him, is not the adulterer nor the thief. He also holds that motion and the mover are two accidents in the body; in the same way blackness and the black are two accidents in the body, and so knowledge and the knower, power and the powerful, life and the living, are all accidents but not bodies. Knowledge, to his mind, does not reside in the knower but in him who is the place for the knower, and motion does not abide in the moving object but in that which is the place for the moving object.

'Abd-al-Kāfir relates: I held a disputation on this question with this Ibrahim ibn Muḥajir in the presence of Nāṣir al-Dawla, Abu-l-Ḥasan Muḥammad ibn Ibrahim ibn Sīnājir, General of the Samānid army, in the year 370³. In it I ¹ Acc. to the Shāfiites all the four practices are required by law, ib., 170.

² Arab. Niyā (very similar to Heb. Kawwānā) Acc. to Muḥammadan law, not only are an inner preparation and full-heartedness required with external practices but an actual declaration to the effect. See Hughes, Dictionary of Islam, 434.

³ He had held the generalship for a long time (the first record of it in the year 354, IA, VII, 417; he had previously been chief of Khurāsān, was removed, but reinstated) until he was finally removed in 371. He is accused of having become too strong and independent. IA, IX, 7-8. He did not accept his removal and became a rebel until he was killed in 372. ib., 17-20. See also Uṣūl, 95-119.

¹ Reading هو, هو with MS.; Ed. هو.

² Reading هو with MS.; Ed. هو.

³ Referring to Sura 7, v. 171. See the traditions around this verse, Tirmidhī, II, 180-81.

⁴ See ib., ib.; ib., 53a-b; The Prophet is apparently Adam.

⁵ Ash'arī, 141; Shahr, 84; ib., 53a, ib., ib., II, 112.

⁶ Same sources as above.

⁷ Reading هو with Ed.; MS. هو.

⁸ See Jaynibūl, 70, for the Shāfiite regulation for a traveller; for the various technical terms, ib., 75-80; See Muzāni (Umm, I, 121-30 margin).

⁹ See Shāfiite requirements Jaynibūl, 71-2.

¹⁰ Al-ha'ith and Anjās are two types of impurity. The former includes seminal discharges, contact with a woman to whom one is not married, etc. The second is applied to contact with unclean objects. Jaynibūl, 72-4, esp. 72, note 2.

CHAPTER EIGHT

THE DOCTRINES OF THE ANTHROPOMORPHISTS AMONG THE VARIOUS DIVISIONS

Know, may God make you prosper, that the Mushabbihā (anthropomorphists) fall under two categories, one of which likens the essence of the Creator to the essence of others, and another which draws a similarity between His attributes and the attributes of others. Each of these two is split up into many subdivisions. The Mushabbihā whose error consists in comparing His essence to that of others comprise a number of groups. The rise of the doctrine of anthropomorphism is linked with several groups among the *Ghulāt Rawāfiʿ*¹. One of them is the Sabbābiyya who called 'Alī God and identified him with the essence of God. When he committed a number of them to the flames they declared: Now we know that you are God for none but God punishes with fire². Another is the Bayāniyya, adherents of Bayān ibn Saʿīd who believed that his Worshiped One is a person of light³ and possesses limbs which have a human form; He will perish completely save His face. Still another is the Mughniyya, followers of Mughniḥa ibn Saʿīd al-ʿijlī who believed that the Object of his Worship possesses limbs and that they are shaped like the letters of the alphabet. Then there are the Manṣūriyya, followers of Abū Manṣūr al-ʿijlī, who likened himself to his Lord, believing that he was raised to heaven. He also thought that God patted him forced him to admit that the person flogged for adultery is not the adulterer and that the person whose hand is amputated for theft is not the thief. Then I forced him to admit that the Object of his Worship is an accident since, according to him, the Worshiped One is a name, and the names of God in his view are accidents inherent in a primordial body. He retorted: The Worshiped One is an accident in a primordial body but I worship the body and not the accident. But I answered him: In that case⁴ you do not worship Allāh, because Allāh, according to you, is an accident and you maintain that you worship the body and not the accident.

215

The ignominies of the Karāmiyya are very numerous. But we have cited a sufficient number of them in this chapter, and Allāh knows best.

¹ Reading bi with Ms; Ed. bi.

¹ All the sects of the Ghulāt Rawāfiʿ are treated more fully in the next section and therefore no details will be given about them in this chapter.

² The tradition is related in Bukhārī, II, 352; the Prophet once sent a detachment with instructions that if they found certain men they were to burn them. As they were preparing to leave, he said to them: I told you to burn them, but only God punishes with fire; if you find them kill them. Cf. Baḍʿ al-Tarīkh, V, 131 (Arabic 125).

³ Reading ya with MS.; Ed. ya.

on his head with his hand and said: O my son, convey a message from Me. Among them are also the Khattābiyya who profess the divine character of the Imāms and of Abu-l-Khattāb al-Asadi, also those who profess the divinity of 'Abdallah ibn Mu'āwiyā ibn 'Abdallah ibn Ja'far. They include the Hūlīyya who believe that God inheres in the person of the Imāms, and who, in consequence of it, worship the Imāms; the Hūlīyya who are called Hūlīmāniyya and are traced to Abu Hūlmān¹ al-Dimishki, who maintained that God inheres in every beautiful form; he used to prostrate himself before every beautiful form. Among them are the Muḥannaḥiyya Muḥayyida situated in Ma-wāra-n-nahr, who assert that Al-Muḥannaḥ was a god and that he assumes a particular form in every age. There are also the 'Azākir² who believe in the divinity of Ibn Abu-l-'Azākir who was executed in Baghdad. All of these groups which we have mentioned in this chapter are excluded from Islam although they externally claim relationship with it. We shall specify in detail³ the doctrines of each of these groups in the fourth section of this book when we get to it, God willing.

In addition, there are sects among the Mushabbihā whom the theologians have included among the sects of Islam because they affirm the obligatory character of the precepts in the Kuṛ'ān, since they recognize the binding force of the fundamentals of the Law of Islam such as prayer, fasting and the pilgrimage, and because they confirm the prohibitive nature of the forbidden things. They regard them as Muslims despite the fact that they err and are heretics with respect to some of the intellectual principles. This division includes the Hishāmiyya⁴, which traces its origin to Hishām ibn al-Hakam al-Rāfiḍi⁵. He compared his Worshipper One to a human being⁶ and believed as a result that He

¹ With MS.; Ed. عبدالله and عبدالله .

² Ed. أزكر ; MS. doubtful, but see below 84.

³ Reading أزكر with Ed.; MS. أزكر .

⁴ Ed. 47—51 (Seeley, 67—70).

⁵ Died c. 200 A. H. He lived in Kīfa and this fact is cited by Ibn Hāzīm several times to strengthen the validity of his testimony (e. g. Shiites, I, 63 and 72). For more biographical details see Shiites II, 65—6 and Intisar, 177—8. Acc to Intisar, 41, he was a friend of Abu Shākir al-Daḡānī, the father or grandfather of the founder of the Karmāthian movement. See Ed., 266 (below 108).

⁶ His anthropomorphic views are treated in detail, Ash'ari 31—3; Makrizi, 348 (He says that they are also called Hakamiyya).

measures seven spans by His own span and that He is a body having ends and limits. He is describable in terms of length, width and depth and is endowed with color, taste and odor. It has been reported in his name that the Object of his Worship is like an ingot¹ of silver or like a revolving pearl². It has been reported of him that he pointed out Mount Abu Kubbais as being larger than He³. It is also reported of him that he maintained that the rays emanating from his Worshipper One fall upon whatever He sees⁴. A detailed account of his anthropomorphic views has already been given by us in the special⁵ study of the doctrines of the Imāmiyya.

It includes the Hishāmiyya who are associated with Hishām ibn Salīm al-Jawālīki⁶. He was of the opinion that the Object of his Worship is cast in the shape of a human and that His upper half is hollow and the lower solid⁷. He has black hair and a heart from which wisdom flows⁸. Another one of them is the Yūnusiyya which owes its existence to Yūnus ibn 'Abd al-Rahmān al-Kūmī⁹. He held that God is borne by those who bear His throne although He is heavier than they, just as the crane is supported by its two legs although it is heavier than they¹⁰. There are the Mushabbihā who are related to Daud

¹ Reading عصا with MS.; Ed. عصا .

² Ash'ari, 33, calls attention to the fact that in one year he held five different doctrines on the nature of God. See Shiites, I, 53.

³ Abu Kubbais is the highest mountain near Mecca, Yaḳūl, I, 101f. See Ed. 48 and Ash'ari, ib.

⁴ Ash'ari, 33, explains that this is how He knows what is under the earth and adds that if it were not for his idea of rays the doctrine would be orthodox.

⁵ Ed. أزكر ; MS. أزكر .

⁶ Or Juwālīki (Shiites, II, index, s. v. Hishām; Strothmann reads: Juwālīki, El, IV, 352b). Acc. to Tūsi, who cites a polemical work against him, written by Hishām b. al-Hakam (Intisar, 176), he lived in the second century. Nauwakhtī lists him, Hishām b. al-Hakam, 'Ubaid b. Zurāra [b. Ayyun?] and others as supporters of Mūsā al-Kādhim's claims to the Imamate, 66.

⁷ This view is ascribed by Ash'ari, 153 and Shahr, 97, to al-Jawālīki (see below). Makrizi, ib., agrees with our author.

⁸ Ash'ari reports that he also ascribed the five senses to God, and so also Makrizi.

⁹ Both Fihrist, 220 and Ash'ari, 35, name him Mawla of the family of Yaḳūl. On the family see Fihrist, 224.

¹⁰ Ash'ari, ib.; Ed., 53 (Seeley, 72; both Ed. عصا) and Seeley (the throne) miss the point in the comparison).

al-Jawārihi¹. He described his Worshipped One as possessing all the human organs except the pudenda and the beard². There are also the Ibrahīmiyya who trace their origin to Ibrahīm ibn Abū Yahya al-Aslami³. He belonged to a group of traditionalists but he erred in anthropomorphism and was therefore branded as a liar in many of his traditions. Another one of them is the Hāṭhiyya among the Kadariyya. They are linked with Ahmad ibn Hāṭi who was one of the Mutazilites who regarded themselves as disciples⁴ of Al-Nazzām. He likened ʿĪsa ibn Maryam to his Lord, believing him to be the second God, and that it is he who will call mankind to account on the day of resurrection. Still another one is the Karrāmiyya and its declaration that God is a body possessing an end and limit, that He is the place for all created entities, and that He is contiguous to His throne. We have already given an adequately detailed account of their doctrines. All of these compare God's essence to that of His creatures.

As for the Mushabbihā who liken His attributes to the attributes of His created beings, they consist of a number of groups. One of them likens the Will of God to the will of His creatures. This is the doctrine of the Mutazila of Basra who hold that God wills the objects of His Will with a created will. They believe that His Will is of the same genus as ours. However, they contradict this assertion by saying that it is possible for God's Will to be created not-in-a-subject; the creation of our will is possible only in a subject. This therefore ¹ This name appears in a number of variants but Al-Ashʿarī's reading adopted above is, no doubt, the correct one, as it is supported by Shahr, 143, Mizān, I, 326; Lisān al-Mizān, II, 427 and Intisāʾ, 67. Ist. B. also reads Jawārihi but Ist. P, Hawnī. See Shiʿite, II, 67—8. — Mizān and Lisān al-Mizān, Ib., relate that he is the chief of the anthropomorphists and is condemned to hell. In a tradition he is classed with Bishr al-Marisi.

² Samʿāni, s. v. Hishāmī; Shahr, 77.

³ Ibrahīm ibn Muḥammad ibn Abū Yahya (died 184 A. H.) is a Rāwī who was suspected of Mutazilism, Jaharism, and Rāfidism. Most traditionalists did not credit his transmissions. When Malik was asked about the authenticity of his reports he answered that neither they are to be trusted nor his religious behavior. Others call him a liar outright. It is noteworthy however that Al-Shāfiʿi, who knew of his Kadariite views, heard and studied his traditions and later utilized them although he mentions the Rāwī by his Kunya or merely by the name Ibrahīm. See Mizān I, 77—9.

⁴ Reading ʿĪsā with Ed.; MS. ʿĪsā. On the Hāṭhiyya see Ed., 260—1 (below 99-100).

contradicts their doctrine that His Will is of the same genus as our will, because when two things are alike and of one class, then that which is possible for either of them is admissible for both and what is impossible for either is impossible for both. The Karrāmiyya exceeded the Mutazila of Basra in comparing the Will of God to the will of His creatures, by believing that His will is of the same genus as ours and that it is created in Him just as our will is created in us. In consequence of this they maintain that God is the subject of all creation. Far be God from this.

Another group is represented by those who draw a resemblance between God's Word and the word of His creatures¹. They hold that God's speech consists of sounds and letters belonging to the same species as the sounds and letters which are ascribed to mankind. They teach the creation of His Word, and all of them, with the exception of Al-Jubbāi, declare the eternity of God's speech to be absurd. One of them, Al-Nazzām, said: There is nothing miraculous in the composition of God's Word just as there is nothing remarkable about the composition of the speech of mankind. The majority of the Mutazilites believe that the Ethiopians, Turks and Khazars² are capable of producing a Kurʾān similar to ours or even more rhetorical³, only they lack the knowledge required for the compilation of such poetry. But this knowledge may well be within their power. The Karrāmiyya joined the Mutazila in affirming the creation of God's Word, but they distinguish between utterance and speech by declaring that the utterance of God, far be He from it, is of the same species as the sounds and letters produced by mankind, and that His speech is His capacity to originate the Word. They exceed the Mutazila in their doctrine about the originated character of God's utterance in His essence, proceeding on the basis of their fundamental principle that God may be conceived as the subject of all created entities.

Another group among them are the Zurāfiyya, followers of Zurāfa ibn Aʿyun al-Rāfiʿi⁴. They teach the creation of all of God's attributes and assert that they

¹ Ed., 325—6 (below 100—101); Shahr, 78—9.

² Ed. ʿĪsā.

³ Intisāʾ, 79; the author denies this charge against the Mutazila.

⁴ Acc. to Fihrist, 220, his real name is ʿAbd Rabhīh and his father was a Greek (or Roman) slave. He is characterized as one of the outstanding Shiʿites in Fīḥ and Ḥadīth.

belong to the same genus as our attributes. They believe that God was not eternally living nor knowing nor powerful nor willing nor hearing nor seeing. He became entitled to these attributes only when He created for Himself life, power, knowledge, will, hearing and seeing, just as one of us becomes living, powerful, hearing, seeing and willing when life, power, will, knowledge, hearing and seeing are created in Him.³ There is another group among the Rawāfiḍ which teaches that God does not know a thing until it comes into existence. They therefore require that His knowledge be created just as it is necessary for the knowledge of any knower among us to be created. If we should prolong this chapter it will become elongated and the train of its garments will increase. We have already given a detailed exposition of the doctrines of the Muṭazila and the Mu-shabbihā and of the other people of fancy in our book which is called Book of Religions and Dogmas. What we have related of these things in this chapter is adequate, and Allah knows best.

³ Asṭ'arī, 36. He names his adherents الروافض. As Friedländer points out (Shiites, II, 66) Zurāra's view is adopted from Hishām b. al-Hakam. Cf. Ed. 49 (Seelye, 68).

AN INQUIRY INTO THE FACTIONS WHICH CLAIM TO BELONG TO ISLAM

BUT DO NOT¹

The discussion in this section will center on the differences of opinion among theologians as to who is to be reckoned within the community and faith of Islam. We have already mentioned previously that some people think that membership within the community² of Islam is granted to everyone who confesses the prophecy of Muḥammad and that everything which was revealed through him is true, regardless of what his views besides that may be. This is the system³ of Al-Kaṭibī in his treatise.⁴ The Kurāmiyya think that membership in the community is extended to everyone who says: There is no God but Allah, Muḥammad is the Prophet of Allah, regardless of whether he is sincere in it or believes the contrary. These two groups are forced to include the ṣawriyya⁵ and the Shadhkaniyya⁶

¹ MS. adds و before لا; omitted in Ed.

² Reading الجماعة with MS. Ed. الجماعة.

³ Reading with MS. الجماعة; Ed. الجماعة. For translation see Rāzi, 161.

⁴ Ed., 8 (Seelye, 27); for his biography see Sam'ānī, 485 a.

⁵ Followers of 'Isa of Ispahān. For his system see Shahrī, 168.

⁶ Without entering into the history of the long discussion around the identity of this group and its relation to the Yūdghāniyya (see e. g. REJ, XXIX [1894], 207, and LX [1910], 311), it will be best to quote Poznansky, probably the best authority on this subject: "Together with the Yūdghāniyya, the Ḳarālī Japhet b. 'Alī (and similarly other Ḳarālīs) include the Shadhkaniyya. Acc. to Graetz they are the Mushkaniyya, but I prefer the view of Schreiner (REJ, XXIX, 207), that they are the Shaḳāniyya or the Shadhkaniyya, concerning whose founder the Arabic author 'Abd-al-Kāfir al-Baghādī relates that he maintained that God sent Muḥammad to the Arabs and the other nations, revealed the Qur'ān to him and enjoined the fundamentals of the Islamic Law on him. In that case it is possible that the Shadhkaniyya are part of the Mushkaniyya. Japhet further relates that they also taught (like the Yūdghāniyya) that we are not required to among the Jews within the community of Islam, because these affirm that there is no God but Allah and Muhammad is the Apostle of Allah, believing however that Muhammad was sent to the Arabs. They acknowledge that what he enjoined is true.

Others among the jurists teach that inclusion in the Community of Islam can be extended to whomever believes in the obligatory character of the five prayers directed toward the Ka'ba. But this is not true because most of the apostates who apostasized by refusing to pay the poor-rate in accordance with the Covenant of the Companions, nevertheless recognized the necessity of offering prayer in the direction of the Ka'ba. They only reverted from the faith by their denial of the compulsory poor-rate. These are the apostates among the Banu Kinda and Tamim.¹ The apostates among the Banu Hani' and the Banu Asad have become heretics for two reasons. In the first place they rejected the compulsory poor-rate, and in the second, they acknowledged the prophetic character of Musailima and Tulaiha.² The Banu Hani' rejected in addition the compulsory morning and evening prayers and heaped heresy on heresy.³

The approved view, according to us, is that membership in the Community of Islam is extended to everyone who affirms the creation of the Universe⁴, the unity and pre-existence of its Maker, and that He is just and wise, rejecting at the observe the laws of purity and impurity in the Diaspora and that festivals are celebrated only for commemorative reasons. Another strange thing related of the Shadhāniyya is that in their view a sinner has to fast forty days because the meaning of 'he is to strike him forty' (Deut. XXV, v. 3) is fasting;the fast must be observed in the month of Shebat. — At any rate we may well consider the Yūdghāniyya, the Mushkāniyya and the Shadhāniyya as one sect." Reshmoth, edited by Draynov, I, 215.

¹ See Shahr. 13. On the matter of the Ridda see Caetani, Annali dell'Islam, vol. II (sub anno 11), § 83 ff.

² On these prophets see below (201). As Becker has pointed out their names were Maslama and Tala, but were turned into diminutives as a mark of scorn. Cambridge Mediaeval History, II, 336.

³ On those apostate sects see Müller I, 173—183; see also Ed., 333 and 335 (below 301 and 204).

⁴ A much more extended treatment of the orthodox creed is afforded in Section V of this book. See also Iḥāna, 7—13, and a translation from Al-Nasafi in MacDonald, Muslim Theology, 308—315.

same time both Tashbīh (anthropomorphism) and Ta'īl (divesting of attributes). He must also acknowledge the prophecy of all His prophets and the veracity of the prophecy and apostolate of Muhammad to all mankind, and the perpetuation¹ of his Law; that everything which was revealed to him is true and that the Kur'ān is the source of all the precepts of his Law. He must also recognize the duty of the five prayers in the direction of the Ka'ba, of the poor-rate, of the fast of Ramadan and of the pilgrimage to the House, which are required of the community as a whole. Whoever professes all this is included within the people of the community of Islam. After this he is to be observed; if he does not adulterate his faith with an abominable innovation which leads to heresy, then he is a Sunni Unitarian. But if he joins to it some abominable innovation he is to be watched. If it is along the lines of the heterodoxy of the Bāṭiniyya,² the Bayāniyya, the Muḡhiriyya, the Mansūriyya, the Janābiyya, the Sabbābiyya, or the Khattābiyya among the Rawāfiḍ; or if he follows the doctrine of the Ḥuṭūbiyya or the doctrine of the believers in metempsychosis or the rites of the Māminiyya or the Yazidiyya among the Khawārij or the Ḥimāriyya among the Kadariyya; or if he is of those who forbid in their own name anything whose lawfulness the Kur'ān has indicated or of those who allow in their own name anything which the Kur'ān has forbidden, he is not regarded as one of the Community of Islam³. But if his heterodoxy is of the type of the Zaidiyya or Imāmiyya Rawāfiḍ or of the heterodoxies of most of the Khawārij or the Murāzila or of the Najāriyya, the Jalmiyya, the Dīrariyya, or the Corporealists among the community, he is counted as one of the community of Islam with respect to certain laws; namely, he may be buried in the cemetery of the Muslims and he is to receive his share of the spoils if he makes a raid with Muslims. He is not prevented from entering the mosques of the Muslims or from praying in them. In other respects he is excluded from the Muslim community. Prayers on his behalf or in his memory are not lawful; his means may not be eaten nor can any woman [following any of the above heresies] be married to a Sunni nor may anyone of them marry a Sunni woman.

¹ Reading ṣūṭ with MS; Ed. ṣūṭ, and so throughout the book where the word ṣūṭ appears in Ed. I cannot see the reason why Hitt prefers the reading of our Ed. to his MS, reading which conforms to that of our Ms. Mukhtasar, 140.

² All of the sects listed here are treated in the following chapters of this section.

³ For the regulations governing the various sects of Islam see Ed., 348 ff. (below 218 ff.).

The sects which pretend to belong to Islam externally, while in reality they are excluded from the community, are twenty in number. This is their list: Sabbābiyya, Bayāniyya, Harbiyya, Muḡniyya, Maṣūriyya, Janābiyya, Khaṭābiyya, Ghurābiyya, Muḡawwida¹ [Dharmīyya² Shurāfiyya, Namīriyya, Ḥulīliyya, the believers in metempsychosis, Ḥāṭiyya, Ḥimārīyya³, Muḡannaʿiyya, Ruzāmiyya, Yezādiyya, Mainūmiyya, Bāṭiniyya, the Ḥalāṭiyya, the Azāḡiriyya⁴ and the Licentious. Generally, each of these sects has branched out into many sub-sects which we shall specify in detail in a separate⁵ chapter, God willing.

¹ With MS.: Ed., Muḡawwidiyya.

² The three sects in brackets do not appear in Ed.

³ With MS.: Ed., Ḥimādiyya.

⁴ With MS.: Ed., Adāḡiriyya.

⁵ Reading ٢, ٤٠ with MS.; Ed. ٢, ٤٠.

CHAPTER ONE

THE DOCTRINE OF THE SABBĀBIYYA¹ AND THEIR EXCLUSION FROM ISLAM²

The Sabbābiyya are followers of ʿAbdallāh ibn Sabā³ who exaggerated with respect to ʿAlī, maintaining that he was a prophet. Then he exaggerated still further believing that he was a God⁴. He spread propaganda for this belief among the ʿerring Kufites. The story of this group was reported to ʿAlī who ordered a number of them to be burnt in two pits⁵, so that one of the poets sang concerning it:

May misfortunes hurl me wherever they will

So long as they hurl me not into the two pits.

However, ʿAlī feared to burn the rest of them lest the people of Syria

¹ Generally and more correctly called Sabbābiyya after its founder. The spelling Sabbābiyya or Sabbābiyya is explained in Shiʿites II, 41, as a derivative from ٤ meaning to accuse or denounce and applied to this sect because of its hostile attitude to the three Khalīfs who preceded ʿAlī. Cf. also l. c., appendix A., p. 142.

² For a critical study of Ibn Sabā³ as well as an appraisal of the motives behind the various statements made by sect-historians see Friedländer's article in ZA, XXIII and XXIV, (1909—1910). In connection with it, Friedländer has translated most of this chapter XXIII, pp. 308—313 and edited it completely, as well as Isf, XXIV, 38—43.

³ His full biography is given El, I, s. v.; also Friedländer, ZA, XXIV, 19 ff. He relates him to the Felashas of Abyssinia on the basis of his mother's name (Sawdā-Black) and his teachings which are a mixture of Jewish and Christian views, 26 ff., esp. 27.

⁴ He is reported to have said to ʿAlī: ٤١ ٤١ (you are you), a manifestly Sufistic utterance. Ashʿarī, 15, and Shahr. I, 132 (Harttrücker 200). According to Badʿ wal-Taʾrīkh, V, 131 (Arabic 125) he expressed himself even more fully: You are the God of the Universe, you are our Creator and Supporter, you grant us life and send death upon us. Friedländer, ZA, XXIII, 319, rejects this as definitely unauthentic.

⁵ Despite all the authorities who report this auto-da-fé, Friedländer doubts its historicity suspecting it to be an Imāmite invention (ZA, XXIII, 316 ff.). Cf. this view as expounded by Massignon, Passion d'al-Halladj, I, 138 ff. and below, 83.

rejoice over his calamities¹ and, moreover, he dreaded the opposition of his adherents. So he banished Ibn Sabā' to Sabbat-al-Madain.² When 'Alī was killed, Ibn Sabā' held that the slain one was not 'Alī but a devil who appeared to the people in the likeness of 'Alī.³ 'Alī himself ascended to heaven just as 'Isa ibn Mariam had ascended there. He said: Just as the Jews and Christians lie⁴ in affirming the execution of 'Isa, so the Nāsihs⁵ and Khawārij lie in alleging 'Alī's assassination. However, the Jews and Christians saw a crucified person whom they confused with 'Isa. Similarly those who affirm the killing of 'Alī saw a slain person who resembled him, so that they were of the opinion it was 'Alī. But 'Alī, in truth, ascended to heaven, and he will surely come down to earth⁶ and take revenge of his foes.

Some of the Sabbābiyya believe that 'Alī is in the clouds⁷, that the thunder is his voice, and the lightning his whip.⁸ Whenever anyone of them hears the sound of thunder he says: Peace be upon you, O Prince of the Faithful! It is told in the name of 'Amir ibn Shurāhīl⁹ al-Shaḥī¹⁰ that when Ibn Sabā' was told: Behold, 'Alī was killed, he replied: Even¹¹ if you bring us his brain in a bag we ¹ This refers to the civil wars in progress at the time between 'Alī and the 'Umayyads.

² Town in Persia about ten farsangs from Ushrūfāna, the birth-place of the famous general Al-Ash'īn, and twenty farsangs from Samarkand, Yakūt, III, s. v.

³ This belief is probably traceable to the Manichees who held the same about Jesus, Shiites, II, 29—30 and Z4, XXIV (1910), 1—2, and to the Gnostic doctric doctrine.

⁴ With Ed. عنه ; MS. عنهم .

⁵ People who make a tenet of the hatred for 'Alī, including the Khawārij generally and a number of Sunnites. They are the counterpart of the Rawāfiḍ who venerate 'Alī and disparage Abu Bekr, 'Umar and 'Uthmān. See Goldziher's excursus on them in Literaturgeschichte, 491—95; Tārīkh al-Awāṣ, I, part 4, 11; and Shiites, II, 159.

⁶ See Friedländer's discussion of the Raj'a (return), Shiites, II, 23—26, esp. 25.

⁷ Ib. 42—3.

⁸ With MS. عنه ; Ed. عنهم .

⁹ Ed. عنه ; MS. possibly correct.

¹⁰ Resident of Kufa, one of Muḥammad's most zealous adherents, a jurist and a poet. He is said to have transmitted traditions from 150 Companions of the Prophet. Born 20 or 31 A. H. died 103. His hostile attitude to the 'Umayyads is cited Muḥ. St., II, 40. See also Wellhausen, Oppositionsparteien, 77.

¹¹ MS. و , which Friedländer corrects to ف ; Ed. و .

shall not admit the truth of his death,¹ for² he shall not die until he descends from heaven and rules over the entire world.³ This group holds that the expected Mahdī is in truth 'Alī and no one else. Regarding this group Ishāq ibn Suwaid al-'Adawī⁴ recited his Kaṣīdah in which he declares himself free from the Khawārij and the Rawāfiḍ and the Kadariyya. The following verses are taken from it:

I declare myself free from the Khawārij; I am not one of them; —
From the Ghazzālī⁵ among them and from Ibn Bāb;⁶
And from the people who, when they mention 'Alī,
Send greetings to the clouds.

But I love with all my heart — for I know that that is the truth —
The Apostle of God and al-Sidqī⁷, a love

For which I expect in the future a goodly reward.

Al-Shaḥī tells that 'Abdallāh ibn Sawdā' supported the doctrine of the Sabbābiyya. Ibn Sawdā' was originally a Jew, a native of Herat⁸ but he feigned

¹ Z4, XXII, 321 ff. where this anecdote is discussed.

² With MS. و ; omitted in Ed.

³ Z4, XXII, 321 ff. The more usual phrase in general and in this connection is عنه عنه عنه (until he fills the world with justice as it is now filled with injustice). Nauwakhtī, 19, Shahr, 132; Shiites, I, 45. On Baghdādī's variant see Ib. II, 30—31.

⁴ Poet, member of the Kurash (Murji, II, 142—3, and al-Tanbih (Ed. de Goeje) 109, in both of which a similar verse is quoted in which the genealogy of the Nizār tribe is traced to Isaac son of Abraham. Tab. II, 280 and 252 uses him as an authority for traditions related by Hubaira ibn Jubair so that al-'Adawī lived about 50 A. H.

⁵ Alluding to Wāḥid ibn 'Alī, the first Mu'tazilite, who was named thus because he would follow the spinning women (سائيات) to recognize the chaste among them in order to give them aims. Kamil (Ed. Wright) 546.

⁶ Wāḥid's pupil 'Amr ibn 'Ubaid Ib. 546. On the relationship between the Khawārij and these two Mu'tazilites, see Z4, XXIII, 311. Kamil Ib. explains that it is because they and the Khawārij alike were innovators (مبتدعون , عنه عنه).

⁷ I. e. Abu Bekr, in contrast to the Rawāfiḍ who rank 'Alī above Abu Bekr.

⁸ Friedländer points out that our author and his imitator Isf. are the only two authorities who count Ibn al-Sawdā' as an individual distinct from Ibn Sabā' while in reality it is merely another name for the latter, after his mother. Shiites, II, 18—19; Z4, XXII, 21.

⁹ Friedländer in Z4, XXII, 23, records that Baghdādī is the only one to trace him to Herat. All other historians regard him as Yemēnite and some, even more specifically, as hailing from Ṣar'a.

Islam, wishing to gain influence¹ and authority among the people of al-Kufa. He related to them that he discovered in the Torah that every prophet is given an heir² and that 'Ali was the heir of Muhammad and that he was the most perfect heir just as Muhammad had been the most perfect prophet. When the 'Alid party heard this from him they said to 'Ali: Verily he is an admirer of yours. 'Ali, therefore, raised his rank and seated him under the stairs of his Minbar [in the Mosque]. Then he was informed of Ibn Sawdā's extravagant attitude towards him and he planned to kill him, but Ibn 'Abbās dissuaded him from doing it, saying to him: If you kill him, your supporters will part company with you, and since you are set on resuming war with the Syrians, you will have to honor your men. Since he feared the sedition which Ibn 'Abbās foresaw as a result of his⁴ and Ibn Sabā's execution he banished the two into al-Madain. After the assassination of 'Ali, the rift-rat were seduced by them⁵. Ibn Sawdā said to them: By Allah, two springs will certainly gush for the benefit of 'Ali in the Mosque of al-Kufa; one of them will pour forth honey and the other oil⁶, and his party will scoop up from both.

The critical Sunni scholars⁷ say that Ibn Sawdā felt deeply attached to the ¹ Mukhtasar makes a note to the effect that it indicates the Jewish influence on Muslim sectarianism, but it appears that he bases his conclusion on material which Friedländer reproduces. See above 41, n. 4.

² Other writers also inform us that as a Jew, Ibn Sabā had believed Joshua to be Moses' heir and then, as a Muslim, held the same view regarding Muhammad and 'Ali. On the parallel between Joshua and 'Ali see ZA, XXIII, 320, and Naubakht, 20.

³ This is a mark of honor. See Becker in Orientalische Studien Theodor Noldeke gewidmet, I, 335.

⁴ This establishes beyond doubt that Baghdādī thinks of two individuals. But it is clear that he misunderstood the source from which he drew, where the two names were probably employed interchangeably. Else the sudden appearance of Ibn Sabā strikes us as unnatural. The argument against Ibn Sabā's execution is recorded also in Naubakht, 19. See note 6 below.

⁵ Reading lv. with Ed. and Mukhtasar, 143; MS. lv. which Friedländer, ZA, XXIII, (1909), 313 terms "recht holperig".

⁶ On this belief in two fountains see Shi'ites, II, 38—39. Acc. to Naubakht, ib., the appeal was made on the ground of Ibn Sabā's devotion to 'Ali and his hatred of his opponents.

⁷ Friedländer uses this statement as proof that the preceding material came from Shi'ite sources. This will strengthen the theory of Imānite influence.

Jewish religion and he sought to corrupt the Muslims and their religious principles by fanciful interpretations concerning 'Ali and his children so that they might believe in him as the Christians believe in Jesus. He identified himself with the Sabbābiyya among the Rawāfiḍ when he found them most extravagant¹ in the heresy of the people of fancy, and he stealthily introduced his blunders by means of allegorization.

'Abd-al-Kāfir says: How can people who claim that 'Ali was a god or a 226 prophet belong to the Islamic sects? Indeed, if it is possible to include these in the category of the Islamic sects, then it should be equally possible to admit into the ranks of Islam those who proclaim the prophetic character of Musallima the Liar.

We say to the Sabbābiyya: If he who was killed by 'Abd-al-Rahmān ibn Muḥjam² was a devil who appeared to the people in the likeness of 'Ali, why then do you curse Ibn Muḥjam? Ought you not much rather to praise him? For indeed, the killer of a devil ought to be praised for his deed, not censured for it. We say to them: How can your assertion that thunder is the voice of 'Ali and lightning his whip be true when the sound of thunder was heard and lightning perceived in the age of the Philosophers prior to the period of Islam? That is why they discuss thunder and lightning in their treatises and differ regarding their causes. It may be said to Ibn Sawdā: According to you and those Jews with whom you sympathize, 'Ali is not greater in rank than Mūsā and Hārūn and Yūsha' ibn Nūn, yet the death of those three is conceded and neither honey nor oil flows for their benefit in place of the sweet water which flowed from a hard rock for Mūsā and his people in the desert. What is it then that preserved 'Ali from death while his son al-Fusain and his supporters died of thirst³ in Karbela⁴ and no water flowed for them, let alone honey and oil?

¹ With Goldziher ج.أ.؛ MS. and Ed. ج.أ. which Friedländer follows.

² 'Abd-al-Rahmān ibn Muḥjam al-Sarimī, a Khārijī, assassinator of 'Ali, El, I, 282, s. v. 'Ali, and more fully Mueller, Islam, I, 332—33.

³ Although Husain's death actually came when he was decapitated, his resistance was nevertheless broken by the lack of water, since Yazīd's forces made the Euphrates inaccessible to him (Lammens, Le Califat de Yazīd Ier, 153 and 162—170). This incident has been developed in the Shi'ite Passion Play into a major motif.

⁴ A place on the border of the desert near Kufa. Its etymology is not known. Yaḡnī, IV, 249.

CHAPTER TWO

THE BAYĀNĪYYA AMONG THE GHULĀT¹ AND THEIR EXCLUSION
FROM THE SECTS OF ISLAM

They are the followers of Bayān² ibn Sam'ān al-Tamīmī. It is they who believe that the Imāmate passed from Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥanafīyya to his son Abu Ḥāshim 'Abdallāh ibn Muḥammad³, then it passed from Abu Ḥāshim to Bayān ibn Sam'ān as his bequest to him.⁴ But they differed regarding the nature of their chief Bayān. Some of them think that he was a prophet and that he annulled a part of Muḥammad's Revealed Law. Others are of the opinion that he was a god. The latter relate that Bayān told them that the spirit of God transmigrated⁵ through the prophets and the Imāms until it came to Abu Ḥāshim 'Abdallāh ibn Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥanafīyya, then it was transferred from the latter

¹ Shahr. counts this sect among the moderate Shī'a, although a few lines below he adds that its founder was of the Ghulāt, 113—14. Ash'ari also lists them both among the Ghulāt and among the moderates, 5 and 23.

² Bayān (or Banān or Bunān. cf. Shīites, II, 88; but he is not right in his generalization as to the "consensus of opinion" about the reading بَيَّان; add to his references Bayān ibn Ash'ari, 5; Sam'āni, 98a; Bad' wal-Tarīkh, V, 130 [Arabic], 1A, V, 154—5; Usul, 351; and Banān, Chunūṭ, 61) ibn Sam'ān al-Mahdi (Shahr. 113; Mizān al-Fīdal, I, 166; II, 344) of the Banu Tamīm appeared in Irāk after one hundred A. H. (Mizān ib.) Naubakhtī, 25, tells of a certain Bayān who was a straw-gatherer, and was burned by Khālid al-Kasrī. Rīthar properly identifies him with Ibn Sam'ān, but it is somewhat surprising that he claimed the bequest from Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Husayn, i. e., al-Bakr.

³ Ed. 27—42, Seeley, 47—60; On Abu Ḥāshim compare Shīites, II, 89.

⁴ Ash'ari adds بَيَّانُ ابْنِ سَمْعَانَ ابْنِ هَاشِمٍ (he had no posterity to bequeath it to).

⁵ On the relation between transmigration (Transmūkh) and the Return (Raj'a) see Shīites II, 26—28 (Friedländer takes issue with Wellhausen [Oppositionspartheten, 93] who identifies the two).

to him, that is, himself. He thus claimed divinity for himself¹ after the manner of the Ḥulū'iyya. He further believed that it is he who is referred to in the Kūrān in His words: "This is a clear statement (Bayān) for man and a guidance and an admonition to those who guard against evil"². He asserted: I am the clear statement and I am the guidance and the admonition.

He maintained he knew [God's] Greatest Name³ and that he could rout armies with it, and that he could invoke Venus with it and she would answer him. He thought that the eternal God is a man of light⁴, and that He will perish entirely save His face. In accordance with his view he interpreted His words: "Everything perishes but His face"⁵ and His words: "Everyone on it must pass away and the face of your Lord will endure forever"⁶. The story of Bayān was brought to Khālid ibn 'Abdallāh al-Kasrī⁷ while he was governor of Ḥīrak. He employed cunning against Bayān until he seized and impaled him⁸.

¹ Mizān, ib. Shahr. 114, and Naubakhtī, 30 relate that he wrote to Muḥammad al-Bakr asking him to become an adherent of his. Shahr. and Naubakhtī add that al-Bakr made the messenger ('Umar b. Abu 'Āṣif al-Azdi) eat the paper on which the epistle was written.

² Sura 3, v. 132.

³ In the theological works on Islam there is no single name which is identified as God's Greatest. Ibn Maḍā II, 227—28, brings a number of traditions according to which various expressions are styled God's Greatest Name, including a number of prayers offered by simple individuals. Similar traditions are collected by Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal (cf. Wensinck, 175—6). Asin Palacios in his work on Ibn Massarra (p. 156) states that the Isim A'ḥām according to tradition is the one hundredth name of Allah. Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī in his book Lawāmi' al-Bayyinat, on Allah's names, devotes a section to the Greatest (62—73) in which he reports a number of views, among them, that it is Allāh or Ḥayy; also the Sūfic view, that any name may be an Isim A'ḥām if the caller rids himself of human attachments and is absorbed entirely in God. There is also a theory that that name cannot be known.—It is a pretty safe assumption however that we have here a direct influence of the Jewish belief in the Shem Hameforash (Ḥashem dōv). Cf. Shīites, II, 82, 87.

⁴ Usul, 73, adds: and his organs are like human organs. Cf. Shahr. 114.

⁵ Sura 28, v. 88.

⁶ Sura 55, vv. 26—27.

⁷ Ed. 6, 35ff. Died 126. Governor of Ḥīrak during the reign of Walīd and, later, again under Ḥishām, Et, II, s. v.

⁸ Tab. II, 1620, and 1A, V, 154 and others state that he as well as Muḥīṭa (see below)

He said to him: If you can defeat armies with the Name which you know, then repel my men with it away from you.

This sect is excluded from all the sects of Islam because it affirms the divinity of its chief, Bayān, just as idol-worshippers are rejected by the Islamic sects. Those among them who maintain that Bayān was a prophet are comparable to those who believe that Muṣallima¹ was a prophet and both groups are rejected by the Muslims. It can be argued against the Bayāniyya: If it is possible for part of God to perish what prevents His face from perishing? As for the statement: "Everything will perish save His face" its meaning is, every deed upon which God's face does not look with favor will turn into non-existence.² The words: "will endure" mean "your Lord will endure", for He says after it "the Lord of Glory and Honor" in the nominative case in apposition to "face". If "face" were in the construct state to "Lord" he would say "Lord of Glory" in the genitive (dhī), because the qualifying adjective of a genitive is put in the genitive.³ This is perfectly clear. Praised be Allah for it.

were burnt. They also relate that the latter took his punishment like a coward, whereas Bayān grasped the pile in high spirits so that Khālid exclaimed to the sectarians: "Woe to you, you do everything wrong; why did you choose Muḡhīra as your head?" The same story is told by Ibn Ḥazm, Shiites, I, 60.

¹ See above page 38.

² This particular explanation of the verse seems to be Baḡhdādī's original. Ibn Ḥazm (Shiites, I, 61) argues that since Allah's face is identical with His essence and since only things on earth can decay it means that everything will perish and God will remain. This is the accepted Orthodox explanation.

³ See a similar argument, Usūl, 76 and especially 110 (IH agrees with this view, II, 166). Al-Ash'ari however, accepts God's face as neither his essence nor not his essence, as he argues about all of God's attributes. See Ibana, 8, and 43 f

THE MUḢIRIYYA AMONG THE GHULĀT AND THEIR EXCLUSION FROM ALL ISLAMIC SECTS

They are the followers of Muḡhīra ibn Sa'īd al-Jūfī¹. In the early years of his career he evinced sympathy for the Imāmiyya,² believing that after 'Alī, al-Ḥasan, and al-Ḥusain, the Imāmate belonged to his grandchild Muḡammad ibn 'Abdallah ibn al-Ḥasan³ ibn 'Alī. He held that this one is the expected Mahdī, and he adduced as evidence for it the tradition which he cited, that the name of the Mahdī will correspond to the name of the Prophet,⁴ and his father's name will correspond to that of the Prophet's father.⁵ The Rawāfiḍ cursed him for ¹ Muḡhīra ibn Sa'īd (sometimes Sa'īd) al-Jūfī, with the kunya Abū 'Abdallah, of the Baḡlula tribe was a resident of Kūfa. The authorities (e.g. Tab. II, 1619-20; Iā, V, 154-5; Mizān al-Mizān III, 191 — Lisān al-Mizān VI, 75-8) emphasize his power as a wizard. They also report that he forbade the use of the waters of the Euphrates because of its uncleanness; he drank well water. The 'Aḡids disclaimed any association with him. Lisān al-Mizān, II, 76-7; Iā, ib. 155 add that he came to both Muḡammad al-Bāḡir and Ja'far al-Sādiq to express to them his conviction that they knew the mysteries of the world, but both spurned him. For a similar report regarding his contemporary Bayān, see above, 47.

² It is likely that the author meant more specifically the Muḡammadīyya. Ed. 42-45 (Seeley, 62-64).

³ Ed. has throughout this chapter the reading Ibn al-Ḥasan ibn al-Ḥusain ibn al-Ḥasan. Only in the first instance is it supported by MS., but it is obviously a mistake. See genealogy of the 'Aḡids, Shiites, II, 160, and Naubakhshī, 115.

⁴ Tab. (Zotenberg) I, 70, cites a similar tradition. Friedländer (Shiites, II, 53) specifies it more particularly to be Shi'ite.

⁵ With Iāf and Makhlāsāt, 147; MS. and Ed. both read c.1. This reading probably came from a confusion with the transmission of the tradition by the Imāmiyya. See Vorlesungen, 222 und 365 note 130. We may draw from this another proof of our author's dependence on Imāmi sources. For the corrected version see Naubakhshī, 54.

urging them to await Muḥammad ibn 'Abdallāh ibn al-Ḥasan ibn 'Alī. Later, after he acquired leadership over them, he announced to them all sorts of extreme heresy, such as his claim of prophecy,¹ and his pretension to know the most exalted Name,² with the aid of which, he believed, he could resurrect the dead and rout armies. Another of his heresies was his exaggerated anthropomorphism. He held that the Object of his Worship is a man of light with a crown of light on his head, and that he possesses organs and a heart whence wisdom flows. He also maintained that his limbs have the shape of the letters of the alphabet, that Alif is the counterpart of his leg, and the 'Ain represents the shape of his eye; the Ha he likened to his sexual organ. Still another was that he spoke abusively of the beginning of creation.³ He held that when God wished to create the universe he uttered His holiest Name. This name flew and placed itself on His head as a crown.⁴ He interpreted accordingly God's words: "Glorify the name of your Lord the most High",⁵ being of the opinion that the holiest Name was that crown. After the crown had descended on His head He wrote the actions of His creatures on His palm with His finger. Then He contemplated them and was provoked by their acts of disobedience and He perished.⁶ Two seas were formed from His sweat, one dark and briny, the other sweet and lucid.

¹ Ash'ari 7; Mizān al-Fīdā ib. (Lisan 76); Shahr. 134. Al-Ash'ari further relates (p. 23) that the Muḥitīya believe that after 'Alī ibn al-Ḥusain, his son Abu Ja'far Muḥammad al-Bakr was the Imām and that the latter bequeathed it to Muḥitā with the understanding that he was to hold the Imāmate until the appearance of Muḥammad ibn 'Abdallāh.

² Ash'ari 7, (he adds that the earth will burst open for his dead and they will return to life); Tab. II, 1619; Ia, V, 154. Bad' wal-Tarīkh, V, 130, reports that he made this claim for Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥanafiyya. According to Yad al-Fārīd, I, 267 he attributed this power to 'Alī ibn Abi Talib. Cf. Shi'ites, II, 83 and n. 1.

³ The doctrine of Muḥitā as exposed in the following passage is annotated adequately by Friedländer, Shi'ites II, 80—85. The account is reproduced by most authorities.

⁴ On the identification of the Greatest Name with the crown in other mystic movements see Shi'ites, II, 83.

⁵ Sura 87, v. 1. Al-Muḥitā no doubt translated it: Glorify the most High Name of your Lord. Grammatically both are possible.

⁶ In addition to the parallel sources collected in Shi'ites, II, 83—4, one may cite a similar story of creation out of sweat in Scandinavian and Iranian folk-lore. Cf. Christensen, Les Types du Premier Homme et Premier Roi, 35—6.

Afterwards He gazed upon the sea and observed His shadow; He went to seize it, but it flew away. He therefore plucked out the eyes of His shadow and created the sun and the moon from them.¹ The rest of His shadow He destroyed, for He said: It is not proper that there should be with me a God besides me. Then He created mankind from the two seas. The Shi'a He created out of the sweet and lucid sea; they are the faithful. The infidels, namely, the enemies of the Shi'a, He formed from the dark and briny sea.

He also believed that God created man before creating his flesh and blood. The first entity among them which He formed was the shadow of Muḥammad.² This, he said, is the meaning of His statement: "Say, if the beneficent God has a son then I am the first of those who worship?" Then He sent forth the shadow of Muḥammad to the shadows of mankind. He then besought the heaven and mountains to protect 'Alī ibn Abi Talib against his wrong-doers, but they refused.³ He then made the same request of mankind. 'Omar bade Abu Bekr

¹ Ash'ari, ib., states that He only plucked one eye from which He created the sun. Ibn Ḥazm (Shi'ites I, 59) relates that He made "the sun and another sun"; similarly Ia, ib. where al-ḥ should be corrected to al-ḥ. Shahr, ib, II, 344 and Usul, 74 agree with our text.

² Goldziher in his article on Neo-Platonic and Gnostic Elements in the Hadith (ZA, XXII [1908] 324—330) discusses the tradition about Muḥammad's pre-existence and on page 326 cites a Shi'ite tradition according to which God first created the persons of Muḥammad, 'Alī, Fāṭima, Ḥasan and Husain in the form of resplendent substances (أشياء باهرية). In this tradition we no doubt find the origins of Muḥitā's statement. The two-thousand-year period is a usual figure in Jewish and Christian time-divisions. It may be added that in traditions of this kind even among the Sunnites, it is the "light-substance" (أشياء باهرية) rather than his shadow, ib.

³ Sura 53, v. 81. That Muḥitā's interpretation has some foundation is evident from the efforts which Arabic commentators exert to deny the inference of a son in the verse. See Baiḍāwī, Zamakhshari, ad loc.

⁴ There is obvious confusion in the relation of this as written down by our author. According to Baiḍāwī who expanded and misunderstood Ash'ari, 8, God seeks somebody to defend 'Alī. Abu Bekr and 'Omar agree to protect him but decide at the same time to deprive him of the Imāmate. The clause regarding this betrayal is awkwardly introduced and the sense of the passage is strange and unlikely. The correct version has been preserved by Ash'ari, II, ib. and Shahr, ib. It is that Muḥammad (he can be the only possible subject of the verb جاء) sought the heavens and earth to prevent 'Alī from procuring the Imāmate but they refused. Abu to take upon himself to safeguard 'Alī and defend him against his enemies and to betray him in this world. He assured him that he would support him in his betrayal¹ on condition that he bequeath the Caliphate to him after his death. Abu Bekr did so. This is the meaning of his words: Surely, we offered the trust to the heavens and the earth and the mountain and they refused to undertake it and were afraid of it, but man undertook it; verily, he was unjust and ignorant². He held that the unjust and ignorant one is Abu Bekr³. To 'Omar he applied His words: "Like the devil when he says to man, Disbelieve, but when he disbelieves he says, Surely I am clear of you"⁴; according to him the devil is 'Omar.

In addition to his blunders which we have related, Muḡhīra ordered his adherents to expect Muḡammad ibn 'Abdallāh ibn al-Ḥasan ibn al-Ḥasan ibn 'Alī⁵. Khālid ibn 'Abdallāh al-Kasri heard about him⁶ and his heretical views and he impaled him⁷. When Muḡhīra was executed, his followers nevertheless persisted in their expectation of Muḡammad ibn 'Abdallāh ibn al-Ḥasan ibn al-Ḥasan. When this Muḡammad announced his pretensions in al-Medīna, Abu Ja'far al-Mansūr dispatched fīṣā ibn Mūsā there as commander of his troops with a large Beḡr and 'Omar, however, accepted it with the conditions as stated in the text. This account agrees truly with the Shi'ite views on the usurpation by the first two Khālifas. That Muḡammad should desire to betray 'Alī is not surprising from the extreme Shi'ite standpoint. — Our author's mistake is that he misunderstood the verb ع assuming it to mean protest so that he inserted the expression "against his wrong-doers". See Muḡhīṣar, 147.

¹ Reading ع with MS (pro ع); Ed. ع.

² Sura 39, v. 16.

³ Mīẓan, III, 191 remarks that Muḡhīra was the first to abuse Abu Bekr and 'Omar.

⁴ Sura 59, v. 16.

⁵ Muḡammad and his brother carried on secret propaganda in behalf of the 'Alids for a number of years during the Caliphate of Abu Ja'far Mansūr, prior to their appearance in 145. Muḡammad is described as of dark yellow complexion, courageous, pious and a good speaker. His Laḡabs were Mahdi and Nafs Zāhīya (pure heart) Ia, V, 422-3.

⁶ With MS. ع; Ed. ع.

⁷ I read ع with Muḡhīṣar instead of ع as MS. and Ed. As in the case of Baḡā there is another version according to which he was burnt at the stake. See above 47-8. Since Muḡhīra was executed in 119, it follows that his partisans adhered to Muḡammad ibn 'Abdallāh for twenty-six years, until 145.

army, and they killed Muḡammad, following his capture of Mecca and al-Medīna. His brother Ibrahīm ibn 'Abdallāh had meanwhile conquered the [district² of Basra and his brother Idīs ibn 'Abdallāh became master over] the Maghreb. Now Muḡammad ibn 'Abdallāh ibn al-Ḥasan was killed in battle in al-Medīna. Ibrahīm³ ibn 'Abdallāh ibn al-Ḥasan was misled by Baḡhīr⁴ al-Raḡhāl and his Mutazilite followers who had pledged their assistance to him against the army of al-Mansūr. When the two cohorts joined battle in Bakḡmara⁵, which is sixteen farasangs from al-Kūfa, Ibrahīm was killed, and the Mutazilite took to flight. But ill fate overtook them⁶ for the campaign against them was entrusted to fīṣā ibn Mūsā and Salīm ibn Kutāiba, generals of al-Mansūr. His brother Idīs⁷ died in the Maghreb⁸, 222

¹ For the story of his revolt see Muir, The Caliphate, Ed. 1915, 483-56; Mueller, Islam, I, 491. A detailed account will be found Ia, V, 390-401 and 402-424, also Tab. (Zotenberg) IV, 382-421. The date of the uprising is 145 A. H. For the battle and his death see Ia, Ib. 414-421, esp. 419.

² I insert the passage within the brackets from Muḡhīṣar, 149, which assumes rightly that the copyist of our MS. omitted a line.

³ After a five-year period of wandering from place to place, during which he carried on an active propaganda for his brother Muḡammad and, after the latter's death, for himself, he finally appeared in Basra in 145 (Ia, Ib. 428-30). The inhabitants of the city soon turned their support to him. Abu Ja'far Mansūr's army was operating at the time on three fronts, so that the Khālif was in a difficult position, ib. 432 ff.

⁴ With MS., Tab. III, 185, 311, and Ia, V, 434; Ed. ع. Abu Muḡammad Baḡhīr al-Raḡhāl was a native of Basra who, upon seeing the head of 'Abdallāh ibn al-Ḥasan, Muḡammad's father who was slain by the Khālif al-Mansūr, became a partisan of Ibrahīm, Tab. III, 185. But at the time of the encounter he either unwillingly or otherwise foiled several good suggestions made by a Kūfite to Ibrahīm which might have brought him success (Tab. Ib. 310-11, Ia, V, 434). The great mistake was that the rebel did not march on Kūfa before Mansūr was prepared to meet him. The remaining events were a series of mistakes. Neither of the two sources identifies Baḡhīr as a Mutazilite.

⁵ Ed. Nakḡmara; in the MS. the first letter is unpointed. See ib.

⁶ MS. and Ed. ع.

⁷ With MS.; Ed. ع.

⁸ Idīs and his brother Yaḡya joined the rebellion of al-Ḥusain ibn 'Alī ibn al-Ḥasan ibn 'Alī in 169 (24 years after the uprising of their two older brothers). When Ḥusain was killed at Medīna and the battle lost, Idīs fled to Egypt and thence to the Maghreb and settled in Wallia in the district of Tanja (Ia, VI, 60-63; Yaḡut, IV, 941).

some say he was poisoned¹. A few historians report that Sulaiman ibn Ja'ir al-Za'ifi² poisoned him and fled to Iraq.

After the death of Muḥammad ibn 'Abdallāh ibn al-Ḥasan ibn al-Ḥasan the Muḥṭirya split regarding al-Muḥṭir. One group declared itself free³ from him, cursed him and proclaimed. Verily he lied in his contention that Muḥammad ibn 'Abdallāh ibn al-Ḥasan is the Mandi who will hold full sway over the world, for he has been slain without ruling the earth or a tenth of it. The other group remained firm in their adherence to al-Muḥṭir and said: Indeed, he is right in his assertion that Muḥammad ibn 'Abdallāh ibn al-Ḥasan is the expected Mandi; he was not killed but is hiding in one of the mountains of al-Ḥajir⁴; biding his time until he will be ordered to come forth. When he reappears the oath of allegiance to him will be taken in Mecca between the Rukn and the Maḥām⁵. He will restore to life seventeen men and give each of them one of the letters⁶ of God's Greatest Name and they will rout armies and possess the earth. These believe that the person slain by al-Manṣūr's troops in al-Medīna was Satan who appeared to people in the shape of Muḥammad ibn 'Abdallāh ibn al-Ḥasan. They are named the Muḥammadīya⁷ on account of their expectation of Muḥammad ibn 'Abdallāh ibn al-Ḥasan ibn al-Ḥasan.

¹ This view is supported by most authorities, e. g. Tab. III 561; IA, II, 69; Nuḥum, I, 542; Yaḥṭū, II, 489—9.

² Tabari, IA, Nuḥum name as his assassinator one Shammakh (عبد) who was engaged by the Khalīf Harūn al-Rashīd; he was later rewarded and given the rule over Egypt. Strothmann, Das Staatsrecht der Zaiditen, 108, supports this view, but he places his death in the 70's, apparently drawing on Yaḥṭū, II, who states that he came to Walla in 172 and lived there until 174.

³ With MS. عبد; Ed. عبد.

⁴ A place in the vicinity of Nāḍ; by the geographers it is described as a spring. See the indexes to the works in de Goeje's Bibliotheca Geographica. Naubakht, who calls that mountain Alamīya, locates it on the left of the road to Mecca, near Najd al-Ḥāziz, 54. See Yaḥṭū, III, 113 (he calls it 'Alam).

⁵ This is part of a tradition relating to the Mandi. See Blochet, 25.

⁶ Their views as those of a distinct sect among the Rawāfiḍ are discussed Ed. 42—45 (Seeley, 62—64). We find there a repetition of Muḥṭir's views regarding the expected Mandi. — According to Ist. B, 57, they are identical with the Muḥṭirya of his day.

⁷ Asṭarī reads: so many letters (عبد عبد عبد), which is preferable to our text.

Jābir al-Ju'fī¹ adhered to this doctrine and pretended to be the heir of Muḥṭir ibn Sa'īd. When Jābir died Beḥr al-A'war (the one-eyed) al-Ḥisari² al-Kaṭi claimed to have been appointed heir by Jābir and he pretended that he would not die. For this reason he lived on the wealth of the Muḥṭirya, by making fools of them. But when Beḥr died they knew that he had lied in his claim and they cursed him.

'Abd-al-Kāfir says: How can a group of people be counted as one of the sects of Islam when they compare the Object of their Worship to the letters of the alphabet and claim the gift of prophecy for their founder? If they form a part of the believing community then the view of those who maintain that people professing the prophetic character of Musallima and Talha can be included in the community is equally valid. It may be said to the Muḥṭirya; If you disavow the death of Muḥammad ibn 'Abdallāh ibn al-Ḥasan ibn 'Alī and hold that the slain one was a Satan who assumed his shape, how are you to be distinguished from those who believe that al-Ḥusain ibn 'Alī and his companions were not killed in Karbela, but hid, and Satans who appeared in their likenesses were killed instead? Wait, therefore, for Ḥusain, for he is higher in rank than his nephew Muḥammad ibn 'Abdallāh ibn al-Ḥasan ibn al-Ḥasan; or else wait for 'Alī and do not confirm his death, just as the Sababīya await him. Indeed, 'Alī is nobler than his sons. In this particular there is nothing characteristic about them.

¹ Jābir ibn Yazīd al-Ju'fī, the traditionist, is reported to have known fifty thousand (some say seventy thousand) traditions. Despite his Shi'ite views the Sunnites were far from unamiable in questioning his authority. See Mizān, s. v.; Nuḥum, I, 342 also reports that "some found him weak" (ضعيف). From the statement made by our author (Ed. 44, Seeley 64) it may be concluded that Jābir believed in a general Rai'a, so also Sam'ānī I, 131 b. where the return of 'Alī is predicted by him. Cf. Shi'ites, II, 23. The difficulty in our text is that Jābir who died 128 or 132 could hardly be said to expect the return of Muḥammad, killed in 145; possibly Maḥlab refers to a general partisanship for Muḥammad.

² See Asṭarī 8, and Shi'ites, I, 60 (he reads Hifl). No further information about him is available. It may be mentioned in passing that Sam'ānī s. v. Hayarī reports a traditionist named أبو إسحاق بن يحيى who believed in the Rai'a. He resided in Kufa.

CHAPTER FOUR

THE HARBĪYYA AND THEIR EXCLUSION FROM THE SECTS OF THE BELIEVING COMMUNITY

They are adherents of 'Abdallah ibn 'Amr¹ ibn Ḥarb al-Kindī² who was of the persuasion of the Bayāniyya and their belief that God's spirit passed through the prophets and the Imāms until it reached Abu Ḥāshim 'Abdallah ibn Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥanafiyya³. Thereupon the Harbiyya claimed that that spirit was transferred from 'Abdallah ibn Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥanafiyya to 'Abdallah ibn 'Amr ibn Ḥarb. The Harbiyya claimed for their founder 'Abdallah ibn 'Amr ibn Ḥarb what the Bayāniyya claimed for Bayān ibn Sam'ān⁴. Both sects deny their Lord and are not among the Islamic divisions, just as the other Ḥalīdiyya are rejected by Islam.

¹ With Ms. 3.8. Ed. 3.

² On the variants of the name see Shiites, II, 124—5 and notes.

³ Since Abu Ḥāshim died in 78, we are right in concluding that 'Abdallah lived before the end of the first century of the Hīja because of his recognition of Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥanafiyya. Asht'ari lists this sect as one of the Kaṣbiyya (p. 22). He also informs us that they believed that Abu Ḥāshim appointed 'Abdallah ibn 'Amr as the Imām in his place.

⁴ Ibn Ḥazm (Shiites I, 73) relates the very significant fact that the founder of this sect renounced his extreme views and became a pious Muslim. His followers then abandoned him and turned to 'Abdallah ibn Muḥawiya (see chapter 6) but retained their original name. Shahr. confirms this fact (113; Haarbrücker misunderstood the passage; cf. Shiites, II, 126). It is noteworthy that in Uṣul, 332—3, Baghdādī does not list this sect among the Ghulāt. Asht'ari's remark on this denial, probably his conversion; cf. the word كفر employed by Shahr. and him.

CHAPTER FIVE

THE MANŠŪRIYYA AND THEIR EXCLUSION FROM ISLAM

These are the followers of Abu Manšūr al-ḡijī¹ who held that the Imāmate circulated among the descendants of 'Alī until it reached Abu Ja'far Muḥammad ibn 'Alī ibn al-Ḥusain ibn 'Alī, called al-Bāḳir.² This al-ḡijī claimed that he was successor to al-Bāḳir,³ then he forsook this pretension and maintained that he had been taken up to heaven and that God stroked his head with His hand and said: "O son, convey a message from me. Then He sent him down to the world. He believed that he was the Fragment⁴ fallen from heaven which is mentioned in God's words: "If they should see a fragment of the heaven coming down they would say: Piled up clouds".⁵ This group denies the resurrection and the existence of Paradise and Hell. They interpret paradise to mean the pleasures obtained in this world and hell to be the misfortunes encountered in the world.⁶ In addition

235

¹ He is thus a member of the same tribe to which Muḡhira belonged as a Mawla. This is important in view of the fact that the practice of strangling opponents mentioned later on is charged by Ibn Ḥazm (Shiites, I, 62) and Van Vloten in Worger's in Irak to Muḡhira as well (see note 1, below). Naubakhtī informs us that he owned a house in Kufa; he had been brought up in the desert and was an illiterate, 34.

² He died 117 A.H. He is the fifth Imām of the Imāmiyya and, more particularly, the Mahdī of the Bāḳiriyya, one of the groups within the Imāmiyya (Ed. 45—6; Seelye, 64—5).

³ According to Shahr. 135—6 and Ijī, 345 he began to make pretensions for himself only after al-Bāḳir refused to have anything to do with him. Their explanation is accepted by Goldziher (Strainschrift, introd. 4—5).

⁴ Naubakhtī ib., adds the curious detail that God's Command was given in Syriac.

⁵ Ijī and Shahr. ib. inform us that Abu Manšūr at first claimed 'Alī ibn Abu Ṭālib to be the Fragment, but later asserted it about himself. Friedländer is therefore wrong in calling Shahr's account of the change of attitude a "contradiction with himself" (Shiites, II, 89).

⁶ Sura, 52, v. 44.

⁷ According to Asht'ari, 9; Shahr. 135—6; Ijī ib.; Shiites, I, 62, Abu Manšūr argued that Hell and all the prohibitions of the Law refer to men whom Muslims are enjoined to hate, to this heresy they thought it permissible to strangle their opponents.¹ Their heresy continued in practice among them until Yūsuf ibn 'Umar al-Thaḡalī,² governor³ of 'Irāq was informed about the ignominies of the Maṣūbiyya. He seized Abu Maṣ'ūr al-Jīlī and impaled him. This sect too is not counted Islamic because of its denial of resurrection, paradise and hell.

¹ Baḡdādī does not emphasize that they employed strangling only and did not permit the use of arms, maintaining that only with the appearance of the Mahdī will the right to carry arms be granted to them. See Shiites, I, 62–4 and 92 f. In an article on Strangers (Wor-gers in Iraq, Feestbond.....aan Dr. P. J. Veth), Van Vloten edited and translated a long passage from the Kitāb al-Ḥayawān by Jāhiz, describing a wide-spread movement of strangling which Van Vloten explains as a mixture of religious fanaticism and rogueship. The ṭij and Bāṭila groups figure prominently among them as well as the Kinda tribe. In a poem cited there Muḡhīra Ibn Sa'īd "the blind" is also mentioned as one of the stranglers. Do we not have in this a confused allusion to Muḡhīra's second successor, Bakr al-A'war? Cf. above, 55.

* He was governor of 'Irāq 120–126 A.H. Acc. to Naudakhi, ib., punishment was meted out to him by Khalīd al-Karrī who disabled him ('ayānu). He further informs us that 'Omar whom he strangely surnames "the strangler" (al-Khamāk) executed al-Ḥusayn b. Abu Mansūr, who claimed to have inherited his father's powers.

THE JANĀHITTA¹ FROM AMONG THE GHULĀT AND THEIR EXPULSION FROM ISLAM.

They are the followers of 'Abdallāh ibn Muṭawīya² ibn 'Abdallāh ibn Ja'far ibn Abū Ṭālib. The reason for their allegiance to him is that the Muṭawīriya who had declared themselves free from Muḡthira ibn Sa'īd after the death of 'Abdallāh ibn al-Ḥāsan ibn 'Alī³, went forth from Kūfa to Medīna in search of an Imām. 'Abdallāh ibn Muṭawīya ibn 'Abdallāh ibn Ja'far met them and invited them to accept him, declaring that he was the Imām by direct descent after 'Alī and his

* He appeared in Kufa in 127 A. H., after having carried on his seditious propaganda secretly. When he was defeated by 'Abdallah ibn 'Omar, the 'Umayyad general, he fled to the Eastern provinces holding under his control the district of Pars in which Ispahan is situated. He was defeated there once again in 129 and killed in prison by Abu Muslim. See LA, V, 262-4 and 282-5; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom and the Fall, 384-6, 393-5; EL, I, 26.

* Ed. 232 (above, 54). According to Ash'ari and Shiites, I, 71, the people who chose 'Abdallah ibn Mu'tawya were not former Mu'għiriyā but Ħarīriyya who either repudiated, or were abandoned by their master. This is supported by Neubakht, 29.

children¹. They recognized him as Imām and returned to al-Kufa and related to their followers that 'Abdallāh ibn Mu'āwīya ibn 'Abdallāh ibn Jafar held himself a God and that the spirit of God was incarnate in Adam, then in Shīr; then it circulated among the prophets and Imāms until it reached 'Alī; then it circulated among² his three children³, and finally passed to 'Abdallāh ibn Mu'āwīya⁴. They maintained that he said to them: Verily learning sprouts in his heart like mushrooms and green grass. This division denied paradise and hell and allowed the use of wine, the eating of corpses, adultery, sodomy, and the other prohibitions. They did away with obligatory prayer and fasting and alms-giving and the pilgrimage⁵. They interpreted these acts of worship as allegorical ordinances for those members of 'Alī's family to whom it is one's duty to display friendliness, and explained that the prohibitions mentioned in the Kūrān allude to certain people whom one is obliged to hate, such as Abu Bekr, 'Umar, 'Alī, al-Zubair and 'Āisha.

Ibn Kutāiba relates in his Kiṭāb al-Ma'ārif that 'Abdallāh ibn Mu'āwīya made his appearance in the districts of Fars and Ispahān at the head of his army⁶. Abu Muslim al-Khurasānī sent an army against him and they slew him⁷, but his ¹ Acc. to Naubakhtī, his followers gave the following account of his rise: He received the bequest from Abu Hāshim 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyya. But as he was still a minor, Saḥīb b. Maḍrik was appointed his regent, and he kept the bequest for him until the latter reached his maturity.

² The remainder of this chapter as well as the beginning of the next are missing in both Ed. and MS., and have been supplied from other sources. The rest of this chapter is taken from Mukhtasar, 153—4.

³ I. e. Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥanafiyya, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusain.

⁴ Ghunya, 99, informs us that they believed fully in megalomania, describing their views as follows: يقولون بالساج وان روح آدم هم روح الله فسقط فيه والمحققون من قتالية الساج زعمون: يقولون ان الروح المعلقة الى هذه اعمار بعد ان خرجت من الدنيا بالوت اول ما تسقط في الجحيم ثم تسقط الى ما دون ذلك اياماً حلا بعد حال الى ان تسقط الى دود اللعنة وما عاكي ذلك وهو اخر ما تسقط فيه...

⁵ The person instrumental in introducing these doctrines was the father of 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥarith (al-Harith). He ascribed these doctrines to the traditionalists Jābir b. Abdallāh al-Arḥabi and Jābir b. Yazīd al-Jiflī (Naubakhtī, 31; see also 35—37 for a lengthy discussion of their views or Tanāsukh). The latter was a follower of the Muḥitīyya, above.

⁶ Ibn Kutāiba, ed. Wüstenfeld, 105.

⁷ Ibn Athīr reports that 'Abdallāh made overtures to Abu Muslim who was carrying on great activity in behalf of the 'Abbāsids and had already conquered Khurāsān but the name followers deny his death and maintain that he is alive in one of the mountains of Ispahān¹ until he will reappear. One can argue against this division: If there exists no paradise nor hell nor reward nor punishment, your opponents need have no fear about killing you or seizing your possessions or leading your wives astray Mu'āwīya seemed to Abu Muslim and his men to be foreign in the 'Alid family and they therefore suspected him to be a pretender. Ia, V, 284—5.

¹ Naubakhtī and Ash'ari explain that his followers broke up into three groups: One admitted his death, another maintained that he is alive in the mountains of Ispahān where he will sojourn until he will reappear and lead the chief horsemen (?; Naubakhtī: its chief men) to a man of the Banu Hāshim (it was through Muḥammad and his son Abu Hāshim that he claimed the divine spirit to have come to him. Yet Naubakhtī adds: of the offspring of 'Alī and Fātima). The third group also believes that he is alive in Ispahān and expects him to come forth and rule over mankind since he is the expected Mahdī.

CHAPTER SEVEN

THE KHAṬṬĪBYA AND THEIR EXCLUSION FROM ISLAM.

They are the adherents of Abu-l-Khaṭṭāb al-Asadi¹, and fall into five subdivisions. They all maintain that the Imāmate belonged to the offspring of 'Alī until it reached Muḥammad ibn Ja'far al-Sādiq². They assert that the Imāms are Gods. During his lifetime Abu-l-Khaṭṭāb used to say that the children of al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusain were God's children and favorites³. He also believed that Ja'far is a God. When this came to the knowledge of Ja'far he cursed him and banished him⁴. After that Abu-l-Khaṭṭāb claimed divinity for himself⁵. His followers declare that Ja'far is a God, but that Abu-l-Khaṭṭāb is superior to him. The Khaṭṭābiyya permit false testimony by their partisans against their opponents⁶.

¹ His full name is Abu-l-Khaṭṭāb Muḥammad ibn Abu Zaynab al-Asadi al-Ajidi (the cripple). Ibn Ḥazm (Shiites, I, 69) makes him a client of the Banu Asad; Maḥrīz, 352, gives as his father's name Abu Thaur ibn Abu Yazid. For variants see Shiites, II, 111-2. ² The sixth Imām of the Twelvers. He is very highly esteemed by both Sunnites and Shi'ites. He was born 80 A. H. and died in 148. Nawāwī, 195; Ikḥāl, I, 300-01.

³ Ash'arī, 11, specifies more clearly that he at first maintained they were prophets.

⁴ The same version occurs in Shiites, I, 69 (emended by Friedländer) and most notably Ash'arī, 11, where only Ḥusain's children are mentioned and thus coincides with Shahr. 136 and the original version of Ibn Ḥazm; in II 343 the reading is أبي جعفر, similarly Ed. 242 reads أبي جعفر and أبي جعفر.

⁵ Shahr. and II 37; Naubakhtī, 37.

⁶ The sources which do not report his repudiation by Ja'far attribute this view to his followers. Ibn Ḥazm (Shiites, I, 69) and Sam'ānī, I, 203 a. ascribe this view to Abu-l-Khaṭṭāb himself without mention of his banishment. Naubakhtī, who does not confirm Baḡdādī's statement, relates that Abu-l-Khaṭṭāb claimed successfully to be heir to Ja'far, prophet, apostle, angel, 38.

⁷ Naubakhtī, 38; Ash'arī, 11; Mukhtasar, 155; II, 346; Goldziher has justly characterized it as a form of Taḥyā (ZDMG, LX, [1906], 222). Massignon, Studies E. C. Browne, Abu-l-Khaṭṭāb sallied forth against the governor of Kūfa in the reign of al-Manṣūr. The latter dispatched an army against him which took him prisoner, and al-Manṣūr ordered his crucifixion in the slums of al-Kūfa¹. His followers said: It is necessary that in every age there should live one articulate Imām and another silent one². The Imāms are Gods and they know the mysteries. They declare that 'Alī was a silent one during the lifetime of the Prophet, while the Prophet was the articulate one. After him 'Alī became the speaker. They profess the same about the Imāms up to the time of Abu Ja'far. In his time Abu-l-Khaṭṭāb was a silent Imām, but became the articulate one after him.

The followers of Abu-l-Khaṭṭāb broke up after his execution into five groups: The Mu'annariyya.³ — They believe that the Imām who followed Abu-l-Khaṭṭāb was a man by the name of Mu'annar⁴ and they worship him as they had worshipped 330, cites a ruling by a Shāfi'ite according to which a Khaṭṭābi is not to be credited as a Rāwī. Cf. Muslim, I, 33 where Nawāwī relates similarly about Shāfi'ites attitude towards the traditions reported by the Khaṭṭābiyya. In Liṣṣan al-Mizān V, 170, Abu-l-Khaṭṭāb is listed but definitely rejected. See Ed. 351.

¹ I have not found the execution recorded by any of the historians. According to Ash'arī, 11, it occurred by order of al-Manṣūr's general, Isā ibn Māsa, probably while he was governor of Kūfa, 132-147 A. H. (Zamḥaur, 43). So also Naubakhtī, 59-60, who describes the battle in detail.

² Ash'arī reports that Abu-l-Khaṭṭāb himself propounded this theory (See also Ghanyā, 99). With the authority of al-Ash'arī behind this statement, the "reluctance" of Friedländer, (Shiites, II, 112, n. 3) to accept this fact, surprising as it may seem, is obviated. What lends even greater weight to the trustworthiness of this statement is the general opinion of authorities about the relation between Abu-l-Khaṭṭāb and the founder of the Bāṭiniyya. Naubakhtī, 589; Maḥrīz, (Fagnan) 47; Ia, VIII, 21; Fihrist, 186. Massignon, ibid. lists Abu-l-Khaṭṭāb's book as the first among "texts of settlement garments." It is also noteworthy that Naubakhtī accuses them of allegorizing laws, 38. This, too, they share with the Bāṭiniyya, see below, 135. For the theory of the Speaking and Silent Imāms see below p. 134-5.

³ Ash'arī, 11, also cites another name for them which cannot be identified nor even correctly read (أبي جعفر sic!).

⁴ Called by Ibn Ḥazm "the coin-dealer" and a resident of Kūfa, Shiites, I, 64-69. Friedländer's suggestion that our Mu'annar may possibly be identical with the Mu'annarī Mu'annar al-'Abbād al-Sulamī (J. c. II, 114), can hardly be sustained since the authorities refer to him so indefinitely as above. Moreover, the founder of the Aḥlīyya was a Kūfi, 'Abdallāh b. Faḥḥ, acc. to some, Naubakhtī, 66-7. The similarity of opinion which he finds

Abu-l-Khattāb. They assert that the world will not perish¹, and they disavow the Resurrection and profess the Transmigration of Souls.

The Bazighiyya². — They are followers of Bazigh³, who asserted that Ja'far is a god, but is not the person people saw, for what⁴ people saw was an image like him. They maintain that to every believer a revelation will be made, interpreting in accordance with this God's⁵ words: "And a Soul will not die except with the permission of God"; that is, a revelation will be granted him by God. They quote further proof in God's words: "And when I revealed to the disciples"⁶, claiming for themselves that they are the disciples. They further cite God's word: "Your Lord revealed to the bee"⁷, and say: Since the revelation to the bee is admissible, the revelation to us should be admitted more readily. They are also of the opinion that there are some among them who are superior to Jibril and Mikail and Muhammad. They also hold that they will not die⁷ and that when one of them reaches his appointed⁸ end he is raised to the invisible world⁹.

is not apparent. Chunrya lists two Mu'ammariyya sects, both Shi'ite; the founder of the second is 'Abdallah b. Ja'far al-A'fah (see Shahr, 126), 99-100 and 101.

¹ Al-Ash'ari, ib., in addition ascribes to them views similar to those of Mansuriyya on Paradise and Hell, and to those of the Janābiyya on Precepts and Prohibitions.

² On this sect see Ash'ari, 12; Shahr, 137; Jij, 346; Makrizi, 352.

³ Ash'ari calls him Ibn Misa. In Shi'ites, II, 112, he is described as a weaver and is accused of having claimed divinity for himself. Ist. B. 57b calls him Abu-l-Bazigh (Ist. P. 76b: Abu-l-Rabi' and the sect Rabi'iyya). Acc. to Naubakht, ib., he rose during Abu-l-Khattāb's lifetime. The latter severed relations with him.

⁴ The passage from the beginning of the chapter to this word, which is missing in both Ed. and MS., is taken from Ist. B. 57 a-b.

⁵ Sura 3, v. 139.

⁶ Sura 5, v. 111.

⁷ Sura 16, v. 70.

⁸ Ash'ari 11, and Makrizi 352, inform us that the Mu'ammariyya likewise believed that they will not die but will be lifted bodily to Ma'la'iz. Friedländer sees in this view a preservation of the old belief in a general Return. Shi'ites, II, 24, n. 1

⁹ Arabic: ʿayy.

¹⁰ Bad' wal-Ta'rikh, V, 137, (Arabic 130-31), relates in the name of the Bazighiyya that their founder ascended to heaven, that God passed His hand over him and put His saliva in his mouth; he also saw 'Ali sitting to the right of the Lord.

They maintain that they see those who ascended from among them at daybreak and nightfall.¹

The third division among them is called 'Omairiyya² — followers of 'Omar Ibn Bayan al-Yifi.³ They give the lie to those among them who claim that they will not die, and declare: Verily we shall die, but our descendants will never cease as Imāms and prophets. They worship Ja'far and call him Lord.⁴

The fourth group among them is the Mutaḍḍaliyya, because they trace their origin to a certain man called Mutaḍḍal al-Sairafi (the broker). They profess Ja'far's divinity but not his prophecy. They repudiate Abu-l-Khattāb because Ja'far repudiated him.⁵

The fifth division among them is simply called Khattābiyya. — It persists in its partisanship for Abu-l-Khattāb and all his claims and it does not recognize the 237 Imāmate of anyone after him.

'Abd-al-Kāfir says: If the Bayāniyya⁶ and Mansuriyya and Janābiyya and Khattābiyya have declared Abu Bekr and 'Omar and 'Uthmān and most of the Companions to be infidels because of their eliminating 'Ali from the Imāmate in their time, they themselves have wrenched the Imāmate from the children of 'Ali during the age of their chiefs. One can say to them: Since 'Ali in his age had ¹ The lack of intelligence with which copyists of MSS. often did their work is well illustrated in the parallel passage from Ist. B. 57b, ʿayy ʿayy ʿayy. Bad' wal-Ta'rikh, ib. finds a parallel to this belief of the Bazighiyya among the Hindus.

² With MS. ʿayy; Ed. ʿayy.

³ Ibn Hazm (Shi'ites, I, 64) names him ʿayy, the straw-dealer. On the basis of this Friedländer would regard our reading ʿayy as a corruption of ʿayy, II, 96. In view of the agreement among authorities (Ash'ari, 12; Shahr, 137 [ʿayy]; Jij, 346 [ʿayy]; Makrizi, ib.; Ist. B., 57 b.) on his father's name, this cannot be accepted. If anything, it is Ibn Hazm who is guilty of the corruption. The utterance "If I wanted to turn this straw into gold" (I, 64) is not proof either way. Naubakht 39 names a certain Ibn Labbān as a Khattābī, probably our 'Omar. — His relation to the Yifi is noteworthy as Friedländer, ib. has already pointed out. Ash'ari and Makrizi both report that they erected a tent in the slums of Kufa — possibly on the site where Abu-l-Khattāb was executed — and convened there to worship Ja'far. But Yazid Ibn 'Omar Ibn Hibaira seized and killed 'Omar, imprisoning some of his men.

⁴ Makrizi reports that he was also banished by Ja'far for calling him God, ib.

⁵ With MS.; Ed. ʿayy.

greater claims to the Imamate than the other companions, his children were more deserving of it in their time than their chiefs. However, these blunders are not to be wondered at. The wonder is rather that some of the partisans of 'Ali kill these, yet find themselves alone in their support of others for the Imamate.

CHAPTER EIGHT*.

THE GHURĀBIYYA, MUFAWWIDA, DHAMMIYYA AND THEIR EXCLUSION FROM THE SECTS OF THE COMMUNITY.

The Ghurābiyya¹ consists of a group of people who are of the opinion that God despatched Jibrīl to 'Ali, but the angel went astray and came to Muḥammad because the latter resembled 'Ali². They say: He resembled him more closely than a raven (Ghurāb) does a raven³ or a fly a fly⁴. They hold that 'Ali was the Apostle and that his children after him are apostles. This sect greets⁵ its adherents by saying: Curse the feathered one, meaning jibrīl⁶. The heresy of this sect is viler than that of the Jews, who said to the Apostle of God: Who

238

* Owing to the omission of a folio in the MS. on which a new chapter began, this and the subsequent chapters are all numbered in the Ed. one less than their actual number.

¹ The three sects mentioned in this chapter are, unlike the other sects hitherto treated, not traced to any individual. Ibn Kūṭaba, 300, has called attention to this in connection with the Ghurābiyya.

² It is interesting that Ibn Ḥazm (Shiites, I, 56—7) refutes this contention of the Ghurābiyya by a comparison between 'Ali and Muḥammad, mentioning among other facts that the former was some thirty years older than the latter, and that Muḥammad could be called tall, whereas 'Ali was rather short.

³ A curious explanation of the name is quoted by Blochet, 148, from the Bayān al-Adyan to the effect that they are called so because they believe that 'Ali is in heaven in the form of a raven.

⁴ The expression "like raven to raven" is part of a standard expression in Arabic, more generally "like date and raven to raven". Goldziher, ZA, XVII, (1903), 53.

⁵ MS. and Ed. جرد. I base my translation on Makrizi, 333; رجلا اعجازا (tr. de Sacy, Intro., 54).

⁶ In Shiites, I, 56, we read that some of the Ghurābiyya exonerated jibrīl, since it was an error.

brought you a revelation from God¹? and added: We do not like Jibrīl because he brings chastisement. If Mīkhaīl had brought the revelation to you — and he never announces anything but grace — we would believe in you. Now the Jews, despite their denial of the Prophet and despite their hostility to Jibrīl, do not curse Jibrīl, but simply believe that he is one of the angels of punishment and not of grace. But the Churābiyya among the Rawāid damu Jibrīl and Muḥammad. God, however, has said: "Whoever is the enemy of God and His angels and His apostles and Jibrīl and Mīkāīl, so surely God is an enemy of the unbelievers."^{1a} In this we find a confirmation of the name infidel for anyone who bears hate to any of the angels. And it is not admissible to include within Islam anyone whom God has named infidel.

Concerning the Muḥawwida among the Rawāid. — It is made up of a group which maintains that God created Muḥammad, then He committed to him the management of the world and the disposal of its affairs². It is he, and not God, who brought the universe into existence. Then Muḥammad entrusted the rule of the universe to 'Alī ibn Abū Ṭālib³. He is thus the third ruler. This sect is more ignominious than the Magians who think that God created Satan and that Satan created all evil things; more shameful indeed than the Christians who call 'Isa the second ruler. Whoever reckons the Rāfīdite Muḥawwida among the Islamic sects is on one level with those who count the Magians and Christians as Muslims.

Concerning the Dhammiyya. — They are a section which believes that 'Alī is God and they revile Muḥammad, claiming that 'Alī sent him to enlighten⁴ the ¹ The following story is related in Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal's Musnad, I, 274, and by Tayalisi, 356—7 (No. 2731; he does not mention Michael but simply سج). Bukhari, II, 331—2 has the same tradition but relates it of one Jew, 'Abdallah ibn Saḷām.

^{1a} Sura ii, v. 92.

² With MS. سج; Ed. سج.

³ According to Ash'ari 16, 'Alī as ruler of the universe is not recognized by the same group which holds that view about Muḥammad but by another section within the Muḥawwida. However, it may be that there was a harmonization between these two views at a later date so that Baghdādī's statement may be correct. Makrizi, 353, counts a sub-sect among the 'Uyāniyya (see below) which, while recognizing the divinity of both 'Alī and Muḥammad, gave the latter precedence, and it is on that account called Mīmīyya (abbreviated from Muḥammadīyya, see Shiites, I, 97, and II, 102—3.

⁴ With MS. سج; Ed. سج.

world about him, but that he employed the charge in his own interest¹. This sect is excluded from Islam because it denies that Muḥammad's prophecy was derived from God.

¹ This sect whose name is derived from سج, to blame, also appears under other names. Ibn Ḥazm, Shiites, i, 66, and Makrizi, 353 call them 'Uyāniyya, the latter tracing the name to 'Uyān ibn Dhīr al-Sadīsi or al-Asadi. Shahr. 134, names him 'Uba or 'Uba. Ash'ari, 14, in speaking of them does not call them by any name. — The groups cited in this chapter persisted for a good many centuries. The Churābiyya are cited in Kūnm in the fourth century A.H. (ET, II, 177). Ibn Jubair (Italian trans. by Schiaparelli, 272) found them in Damascus, 1184. The Dhammiyya exist to the present day under the name of 'Alī-Ṭāhī. See Mukhtasar, 158, n.3, and esp. Minorski's article on this sect in Monde Musulman, XLIV—XLV (1921), 205-302.

CHAPTER NINE.

THE SHURAIYYA AND THE NAMIRIYYA¹ AMONG THE RAWĀFIÐ².

The Shuraiyya are followers of a man who was known as al-Shurai'i. It is he who held that God was embodied in five corporeal beings, to wit: the Prophet, 'Alī, Fātima,³ al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusain. They believe that these five are Gods and there exist five who are their converses⁴. But they differ regarding their opposites, some maintaining that they are praiseworthy because the excellence of a person in whom God inheres would not be known except through his opposite. Others maintain that the converses are to be condemned. It has been related of al-Shurai'i that he claimed once that God dwelt in him.

After him came one of his followers called al-Namiri. Of him it is related that he asserted God abides in his person. These eight Ghulāt sects of the Rawāfiḍ are all excluded from the category of Islamic sects for recognizing gods⁵ other than Allāh. One of the most astonishing facts is that the al-Khatābiyya

¹ I read the name of this sect Namīriyya, instead of Nāmīriyya, guided by MS. Cf. also Maassignon, El, II, 333.

² Ibn Ḥazm mentions both men as tricksters with a mule, III, I, 110 (trans. Asin Palacios, II, 226). The translator disclaims any further knowledge of them. According to Nau-bakhtī, 78, the founder of this sect was called Muḥammad b. Nuṣair al-Namiri. He claimed prophecy, and asserted that he was sent by 'Alī al-Hādī, the tenth Imām (Middle of 3rd century, A. H.), and not his son al-Ḥasan al-'Askari (Shiites, II, 127). He attributed divinity to 'Alī, and was himself a believer in Tanāsukh. He abolished all prescriptions and prohibitions. His partisans had been supporters of 'Alī.

³ According to Maḳrīzī, 353, who deals with the same group under the Dhammiyya they called Faṭima by a masculine name, Faṭīm. He cites a poem in support of this, also quoted by Blochet, 51. N. 5.

⁴ Al-Ash'ari enumerates them: Abu Bekr, 'Umar, 'Uthmān, Mu'āwya and 'Amr ibn al-'Ās.

⁵ With MS. al for al; Ed. al.

believe that Ja'far al-Sādiq entrusted to them a volume in which information can 240 be obtained regarding any knowledge¹ of the Occult which they should seek. They call this volume Jafr². They are of the opinion that only he who professes their views can read what is in it. Ḥārūn ibn Sa'd al-'Ijlī³ treats this in his song as follows:

Do you not see the Rawāfiḍ split among themselves
And each of them making a shocking statement regarding Ja'far?
Some say a God,⁴ while other groups
Among them name him the Immaculate Prophet.
But what causes my inexpressible astonishment is a volume Jafr⁵.
I declare myself free before God from all the followers of the Jafr⁶;
I declare myself free before God from every Rāfiḍīte
Well-informed⁷ in matters of heresy, but ignorant of true faith.

¹ Inserting علم with Goldziher; missing in Ed.

² With MS. علم; Ed. علم. See on this book Macdonald's article in El, I, 1037. The meaning of this word and its etymology are not definitely established. Goldziher, (Literatur-gesch. d. Schi'a, 456, n. 5.), and Friedländer, Shiites, II, 106, n. 2, derive it from Ja'far. Our line علم seems to support this assumption. The Jafr is said to be a work dealing with all past and future events. Guyard, 292, n. 3, who claims to have examined a Jafr with Ibn al-'Arabi's commentary asserts that it is nothing but the alphabet explained Kabalistically. Cf. de Goeje 116-17. - Ja'far's capacities as a magician are well known in Islamic literature. He is also credited with the composition of a work on the magic qualities of Qur'anic verses. See Christensen Khawass-i-ayāt, Notices, 4.

³ Ikhlāl, II, 154 ff. In the Mixzan al-'Iḍāḥ, III, s, v, 333^a, he is described as an extreme Rāfiḍīte and his traditions are, of course, discredited. Friedländer, Shiites, II, 106, has justly raised the problem of the authorship of this poem. It may however, be that Ḥārūn as a moderate Zaidite will allow himself to talk in this "orthodox" manner of extreme Shi'ites. The poem, with the same authorship is also to be found in Mukhtalif al-Ḥadīth, 85.

⁴ Ikhlāl, ib. reads the Imām and so also the oriental Ed. I, 558 and Mukhtalif al-Ḥadīth. There is no doubt, however, that our text is the more correct one, since there is nothing extravagant in his being called Imām, unless the stress is on the second half of the line.

⁵ With MS. علم; Ed. علم.

⁶ Ikhlāl Ist. and Mukhtalif al-Ḥadīth read علم; I prefer our reading.

⁷ With MS. علم, for علم; Ed. علم.

When the adherents of truth abstain from an innovation they incite¹ [people] [To accept] it, and if they should follow truth it would fail.

If they were told that the elephant is a lizard they would accept it,

Or if they were told that the Ethiopian's complexion has turned fair.

They are more stupid than the urinating² camel for he,

If he faces you, will turn his back.

May abomination overtake the people who involve Him in impostures³

Of the kind of falsehoods which the Christians spread about 'Īsā.

¹ With MS. ١,٣٥٠; Ed. ١,٣٥٠.

² With MS. ١,٣٥١; Ed. ١,٣٥١.

³ With MS. ١,٣٥٢, for ١,٣٥٢; and in the next hemistich ١,٣٥١; Ed. ١,٣٥٢ and ١,٣٥١.

THE HULULIYYA AND THEIR EXCLUSION FROM ISLAMIC SECTS.

The Hululīyya,¹ as a whole, consist of ten sects all of which have arisen since the institution of Islam. Their common aim is the endeavor to undermine the tenet of the unity of the Maker. The distinct sects among them go back in the main to the Ghulāt of the Rawāfiḍ, since the Sabbābiyya, the Bayāniyya, the Janābiyya, the Khattābiyya, the Shurāfiyya² and the Nāmīriyya are all members of the Hululīyya. In addition to these, the Muḥannaḍiyya appeared in the district beyond the river Jalūn³; a group called the Ruzāmiyya,⁴ and another called the Berkukīyya arose in Merv⁵. Besides these, a section sprang up among the Hululīyya known as the Huhnāniyya, another by the name of Ḥalālīyya, which is to be traced to al-Ḥusain ibn Mansūr, known as al-Ḥalālī, and a third group, called the 'Azākirā⁶, originating with ibn Abū-l-'Azākiri. These Hululīyya groups were followed by a division from the Khurramiyya who joined them in allowing ¹ Hulūlī, which has several technical meanings, is used here especially in the sense of incarnation which the orthodox reject unconditionally. See EI, II, 333. The Sunnite-Sūfi point of view on Ḥulūl together with a polemical discussion of incarnation is found in al-Huḡwiri, Kashf al-Maḥjūb (tr. Nicholson) 260-6. The name Hululīyya, referring to an abstract idea rather than a person, is not applied to the same sects or people by all historians alike. See below, esp. on al-Ḥalālī.

² Missing in Ed.

³ Transoxania called in Arabic Ma-wara-l-Nahr. Baghdādī regularly adds Jalūn (the name of a river coursing through Khurāsān, Yākiti, s. v.), which indicates that he did not regard it as a proper noun.

⁴ Most authorities (Shahr, [Haarbrücker] I, 173; Stilles, II, 110; ff. 347) name it Ruzāmiyya and its founder Ruzām. I follow MS. which carefully inserts a Damma over the Ra.

⁵ With MS. ١,٣٥٢; Ed. ١,٣٥٢.

⁶ With MS. ١,٣٥٢; Ed. ١,٣٥٢, and similarly for the name immediately following.

the forbidden and in abolishing precepts. We shall briefly mention their several distinctions.

The Sabābiyya are included within the category of the Ḥulū'iyya because of their view that 'Alī became a God through the embodiment of God's spirit in him. Similarly the Bayāniyya maintain that the spirit of God circulated among the prophets and Imāms until it reached 'Alī. From him it went on to Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥanāfiyya, then it passed into his son Abu Ḥāshim, and was embodied after him in Bayrūn ibn San'ān. They therefore acknowledge the divine character of Bayrūn ibn San'ān. By the same token, the Janābiyya are Ḥulū'iyya because they declare that the spirit of God circulated among 'Alī and his offspring and passed thence to 'Abdallāh ibn Mu'āwiya ibn 'Abdallāh ibn Ja'far. They are infidels because of their claim that God's spirit inheres in their chief, and, moreover, because they deny the Resurrection and Paradise and Hell. The Khaṭābiyya are all Ḥulū'iyya because they assert that the spirit of God was incarnated in Ja'far al-Sādiq and, after him, in Abu-l-Khaṭṭāb al-Asadi. This sect is guilty of heresy from this aspect and because they contend that al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusain and their offspring are children and favorites of God. Anyone who pretends that he is of God's children is a greater heretic than the rest of the Khaṭābiyya. The Shurā'iyya and the Nami'iyya belong to the Ḥulū'iyya because they declare that the spirit of God was embodied in five persons, to wit: The Prophet, 'Alī, Fātima, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusain, and because they claim that these five persons are gods.

The Ruḏāmiyya¹ are a division in Merv who went to extremes in aligning themselves with Abu Muslim, the supporter of the 'Abbāsīd rule.² They transferred the Imāmate from Abu Ḥāshim to the 'Abbāsīds. Then they transferred it from Muḥammad ibn 'Alī to his brother 'Abdallāh ibn 'Alī al-Saffāh.³ Following

¹ This sect is named after its founder Ruḏām (Ruḏām ibn Sābiḥ, Maḳrīzī, 353).

² On the history of the period see the last chapter in Wellhausen's Das Arabische Reich, and Van Vloten, La Domination arabe, le Chittisme et les Croyanances Messianiques. Abu Muslim is frequently known as Ṣāḥib al-Da'wa (master of the mission, Friedländer, iqūes, NS. I, 202). Possibly orthodoxy prevented our author and the other historians from employing for the 'Abbāsīd Khalīfas the term Da'wa, generally accepted as heretical.

³ The transfer is traced by Maḳrīzī, ib. through 'Alī ibn Abu Ṭālib, his son Muḥammad, his son Abu Ḥāshim, 'Alī ibn 'Abdallāh ibn al-'Abbās by bequest, his son Muḥammad, Following al-Saffāh, they held, the Imāmate passed to Abu Muslim¹, admitting, nevertheless, the execution and death of Abu Muslim. But one section among them, called the Abu Muslimiyya², are absurdly extravagant about Abu Muslim believing that he became a God through the embodiment of God's spirit in him. They hold that he is better than Jibrīl and Mikā'il and the other angels. They also hold that he is alive and did not die, and they persist in expecting him. Those in Merv and Herāt are called Barkūkiyya³. When they are asked whom al-Mansūr killed they say: It was Satan who assumed the likeness of Abu Muslim in the eyes of the people.

The Muḳannāfiyya are the same as the Muḃayyida⁴ in Ma-wara-l-Nahr beyond the Jāhūn. Their chief, known as al-Muḳannaḥ⁵, was a blind fuller⁶ in Merv, native of a village called Kaza Kaimun Dat'. He had acquired a smattering of engineering and mechanics and the art of incantations, and was of the persuasion of the Ruḏāmiyya in Merv. Subsequently he claimed divinity for himself and concealed himself from people behind a silk veil. The people of Jabal al-Saffāh by bequest and, from him, to Abu Muslim. Naubakhtī correctly says of this party: والمسلمين من الكيسانية, 42.

¹ According to ib., ib., it went from Abu Ja'far al-Mansūr to Abu Muslim. Ash'ari, 21-22 calls the Ruḏāmiyya a branch of the Rawandiyya and similarly the Abu Muslimiyya. Maḳrīzī is, therefore, right in his classification of the Basāmiyya (see next note) for which he is criticized. Stritzel, ib., 119.

² Friedländer's contention, ib., is no doubt correct, that Maḳrīzī's Basāmiyya are worshippers of Abu Muslim, and not Abu Salma, and are, therefore, identical with the sect under discussion.

³ I am tempted to identify this group with the Ishākiyya who, according to Fihrist, 344-5, arose in Ma-wara-l-Nahr as a result of Ishāk the Turk's activities.

⁴ Lane, s. v., on the authority of the 74, identifies this group with the followers of al-Muḳannaḥ who chose this color in contradiction to the 'Abbāsīds who wore black. It was probably done in protest, because of Abu Muslim's execution. See also the note on p. 533 of Wellhausen's Arab Kingdom and Its Fall (Eng. Tr.).

⁵ "The veiled one", - so called from the fact that he wore a veil of silk (according to others a mask of gold) see Ikhail, II, 105-6; IA, VI, 26; Albīrūnī, 194; Maḳrīzī, 354.

⁶ With MS. والمسلمين (read المسلمين); Ed. والمسلمين.

⁷ Yaḳūt IV, 226 who calls it Kaza, describes it as a village near Merv. Albīrūnī ib. writes Kawakimardan.

lāk¹, and also some people from al-Sughd² were deceived by him. His sedition against the Muslims endured for a period of fourteen years³. He was aided against the Muslims by the infidel Turks of al-Khaly⁴ who sought to make a raid upon them. They routed many Muslim armies during the reign of al-Mahdi ibn Mansūr. Al-Mukanna' had allowed unto his followers that which was prohibited and forbade them to believe in prohibitions. He abolished prayer, fasting, and the other acts of worship. He asserted before his followers that he was a God and that he had once appeared in the shape of Adam⁵, another time in the shape of Ibrahim. He then continued to manifest himself in the likeness of prophets down to the time of Muḥammad. After him he assumed the form of 'Alī. After that he was transmitted in the likeness of his children, then he assumed the shape of Abu Muslim. He asserted finally that in the age in which he himself lived he appeared in the shape of Ḥashim ibn Ḥakīm, for his own

¹ With MS.; Ed. 321. It is a city not far from Shaah in the territory of Ma-war-i-Nahr. Yakūt speaks of it as being one of the pleasantest cities; its mountains contain deposits of gold and silver. I, 241.

² The correct reading is 𐌌𐌌𐌌; MS and Ed. 𐌌𐌌𐌌. 1A, ib. relates that the Mubayyida came to help him from Bukhāra and al-Sughd. Cf. Yakūt, III, 394.

³ The agreed date for his downfall is 163 A. H. According to some it lasted from 149 to 161 (1A, ib.); although he dates the defeat in 161, he adds that al-Mukanna's head, according to the version that he was poisoned, first reached the Khalīf in 163; according to others it started in 160 or 161 (Tab. III, 484) Cf. also Nujūm II, 430; Abu-l-Feda, Oriental Ed., II, 10. The number in our text, also copied by Ist. 59b, includes perhaps the early years of his rebellion before it assumed such large proportions.

⁴ A town near Ghazna, Yakūt, s. v.

⁵ The theory of God's revelations successively in various persons is declared by Goldziher, who attributes it to Christian influence, to have been first proposed by Muḥanna'. According to this theory all prophets are really identical. This, of course, is also the point of view of the Bāṭiniyya, Z4, XXII, (1908), 337 ff. The Mubayyida are indeed counted as one of the sub-sects of the Bāṭiniyya. See below 107. 1A, VI, 26, relates that their war-cry was: O Ḥashim help us! To this Goldziher, ib., adds that in his epistles his views of himself as a God are apparent.

⁶ With MS.; Ed. 𐌌𐌌𐌌. Ist. 59b (𐌌𐌌𐌌), read 𐌌𐌌𐌌; Albīrūnī, ib. agree with our author. Tab. ib., and 1A, ib., as well as Ya'qūbī Biṭūlūt Geogr., VII, 304) and Kāẓirī (cited by Browne, Lit. History of Persia, I, 319. all call him Ḥakīm. Ikhal, II, 205 calls him name was Ḥashim ibn Ḥakīm. He said: Verily I am embodied in shapes because my worshippers cannot bear to see me in the form which is properly mine. Whoever sees me is consumed by my light¹. He had a strong firm fortress in the vicinity of Kashsh² and Nakshshab³ in a mountain called Siyām⁴. The width of the wall of its rampart was more than one hundred baked bricks and below it there was a wide fosse⁵. He had with him the inhabitants of Sughd and the Turks from Khali. Al-Mahdi dispatched against him Mu'ādh ibn Muslim, general of his army, with seventy thousand of his warriors and he put them under the command of Sa'īd ibn 'Amr al-Harashi⁶. Then he singled out Sa'īd to attack and conduct the battle⁷. He fought him for a number of years. Then Sa'īd prepared two hundred steps of iron and timber in order to set them across the width of Muḥanna's

¹ Ala (𐌌𐌌) but disclaims knowledge of his father's name (Oriental Ed. I, 573 adds 𐌌𐌌𐌌; cf. Nujūm, ib.). It is noteworthy that in discussing the transmission of God's spirit, 1A, ib., credits him with making the statement that "Ḥashim, according to his doctrine, is al-Mukanna".

² In further illustration of the claim by al-Mukanna', it is worth citing the incident related in Ist. 59 B. His devotees pressed him to reveal himself to them. Despite his warnings they insisted. He therefore placed a concave brass mirror against the sun on his minbar so that it would reflect against the door of the Mosque. He called them to prayer at midday where he said he would reveal himself to them. But as the first people stepped into the Mosque the sunlight reflected by the mirror burnt them and they were convinced of the truth of his claim (see also, Makrizi, ib.). He is also said to have manipulated a scheme by which he could bring the moon up whenever he wanted. Ikhal, ib.; Sissee's Nameh, 290.

³ Ed. and MS. 𐌌𐌌𐌌; Ist. B. and P. correctly 𐌌𐌌𐌌. That the town Kashsh is meant is attested by the various sources.

⁴ MS. and Ed. 𐌌𐌌𐌌; Ist. B. 𐌌𐌌𐌌. It is the Persian name for Nasaf, a city right near Kashsh.

⁵ Ikhal ib. reads 𐌌𐌌𐌌 (Oriental Ed., ib.) Yakūt, III, 155 mentions it specifically as the town where Muḥanna' had his fortress. Muḥaddasi, 376; 1A, ib., Abu-l-Feda all agree with our reading.

⁶ With Ed. 𐌌𐌌𐌌; MS. 𐌌𐌌𐌌.

⁷ With MS. 𐌌𐌌𐌌; Ed. 𐌌𐌌𐌌.

⁸ "In that year (161) Mu'ādh ibn Muslim and a number of generals and armies marched against Muḥanna' and Sa'īd al-Harashi as his superior (𐌌𐌌𐌌).... Then jealousy developed between him (Mu'ādh) and al-Harashi. The latter wrote to al-Mahdi slandering Mu'ādh and guaranteeing him victory if he should entrust the conduct of the war entirely to him. Al-Mahdi yielded, and al-Harashi became the only commander". 1A, VI, 34. Cf. also Tab., III, 484.

fosse, so that his men could pass over it. He ordered ten thousand buffalo skins from Muḥlān¹ in India, stuffed them with sand, and levelled with them the fosse of al-Mukanna'. He then fought al-Mukanna's army beyond his fosse. He compelled thirty thousand of them to capitulate and he killed the rest. Al-Mukanna set himself on fire in a furnace in his fortress in which he had dissolved copper with wines, so that he dissolved within it². His associates were seduced by this afterwards since they did not find either his body or his ashes and they thought that he had ascended to heaven. His followers at the present day in the mountain of Īlāk are the most detestable among the inhabitants. In everyone of their villages they have a Mosque, in which they do not pray, but hire³ a Muezzin who calls to prayers. They permit themselves to eat carcasses and pork. Everyone of them enjoys intercourse with other men's wives. If they get hold of a Muslim whom the Muezzin in their Mosque did not notice they kill him and hide him, yet they are not generally maltreated by the Muslims in their district. Praised be Allah for it.

The Huḥmāniyya among the Huḥliyya originated with Abu Huḥmān al-Dimishki⁴, a native of Fars, whose place of upbringing was Aleppo⁵. But he promulgated his innovation in Damascus and for that reason is named after it. He is guilty of heresy for two reasons. In the first place, he believed in God's¹ Yaḥi IV, 688. None of the geographers in de Goele's Biblioth. save Muḥaddasi devote much space to the town. Even Muḥaddasi, however, mentions nothing about the presence of buffaloes in it, 480-1.

² Most authorities, e. g. Tab., III, 494; Najm, I, 438; Khall, ib.; Yaḥubī, ib.; Abu-Ḥ. Fedā, ib. agree that he poisoned himself and his adherents. Ia, VI, 34 reports both versions.

³ Friedländer's remark on this word that "it gives no sense" (Shites, II, 120, n. 2) is surprising, as the VIII. form of ʿsf makes very good sense indeed being synonymous with employed by ist. which Friedländer prefers; cf. Ed., 197.

⁴ Massignou, al-Hallādī, 362, puts his death at about 340 A. H. By his two heresies (see text below) he recognizes him as an adherent of al-Ḥallālī but adds: «C'est là un résumé perfide de deux thèses connues d'al-Ḥallādī». Huḥwīrī, Kashf al-Maḥjūb (tr. Nicholson) 260, regards this sect as well as the Ḥallāliyya as condemned by the Ṣūfis. But he adds that many consider Abu Huḥmān a worthy Ṣūfī. Ṭūsī in the ʿUlūl (ed. Nicholson, 289) calls him Abu Huḥmān al-Ṣūfī.

⁵ Massignou, El, II, 333 calls him a disciple of Sālim of Basra (see below on the Sālimiyya).

embodiment in handsome beings. Whenever he and his followers saw a pretty face they prostrated themselves before it, taking it into their heads that God abides in it¹. The second aspect of his disbelief was his advocacy of licentiousness, and his assertion that whoever knows God, in the way in which he (i. e. Abu Huḥmān) believes him to be, is relieved of all interdictions and prohibitions, and can allow himself all that he delights in and craves.

Abd-al-Kāfir says: I found one of these Huḥmāniyya citing, in proof of the possibility of God's incarnation in bodies, God's word to the angels regarding Adam: "So that when I have made him complete and breathed into him of my spirit, fall down making obeisance to him"². He held that God commanded the angels to bow down before Adam only because He had embodied Himself in him and really abode in him because He created him in the most beautiful form. Therefore, He said: "We have created man in the finest form"³. I said to him: Tell me about this verse from which you bring proof that God commanded the angels to bow down before Adam, and about the eloquent verse that man is created in the finest form. Is all mankind meant by these two verses? Or one particular individual? He inquired: What will follow from either of the two interpretations which I may offer? I answered: If you state that what is meant by them is mankind in general, you are obliged to kneel before every man, even if he is ugly, since you assert that God abides in all men. But if you say that the allusion is to a particular person, then it is Adam and no one else. Why then do you bow before others who are blessed with beautiful faces, yet do not bow before a horse of noble breed⁴ or a fruit-bearing tree, or handsome birds and beasts? Sometimes it is the flame of hell-fire⁵ which gleams in a face. If you admit bowing to the flame then you have combined the error of the Huḥliyya with that of the fire-worshippers. But since you do not kneel before fire, water, air or the heavens, despite their fairness of form under certain circumstances, do not prostrate yourself before persons of fair appearance. I further said to him:

¹ Cf. Ash'arī, 214.

² Sura 15, v. 29.

³ Sura 95, v. 4.

⁴ Reading ḥayy with MS; Ed. ḥayy.

⁵ Reading ḥayy with Goldziher; Ed. and MS: ḥayy.

Verily the fair forms in this world are numerous, and with respect to God's incarnation in them no single one is more deserving than the other. If you maintain that God abides in all fair forms, is this embodiment like the existence of a property in a body, or like the existence of a body within a body? However, the location of an accident in many subjects is absurd and the location of one being in many places is impossible. Since that is absurd, then that to which it leads is also absurd.

Concerning the Ḥalāḡiyya¹. — They trace their origin to Abū-l-Mughīth al-Ḥusain ibn Manṣūr, known as al-Ḥalāḡi². He was a native of the province of Fars, of a city called al-Baḡiā³. In the early days⁴ of his career he was engrossed in the philosophy of the Ṣūfis. His manner of expression at that time was of the kind which the Ṣūfis call Shaiḡ⁵. It is the kind that lends itself to two interpretations: one, noble and commendable, the other vicious⁶ and blameworthy⁷. He pretended to possess both a detailed and a general knowledge of the several sciences. Some of the inhabitants of Baḡdād and numbers of people from Ṭalīkān in Khurāsān

¹ A very exhaustive study of the founder of this sect is contained in the large work by Massignon, La Passion d'al Hosain ibn Mansour al-Halladi, Paris, 1922.

² The name means a carder. But whether it refers to an actual profession of wool-carding in which his father may have been engaged, or to some miracle, or is some metaphorical name is discussed by Massignon, l. c., 18-20 and 69. (al-Ḥalāḡi was born in 244).

³ A city on the right bank of Kūr, eight farasangs from Shirāz, l. c., 14.

⁴ These early days probably include the period from his adolescence to his fiftieth year, l. c. 20-62.

⁵ Ecstatic, enigmatic phrases. l. c. 375. Nicholson, Kashf, 168 translates it simply as 'ecstatic phrases'. On its importance in Ṣūfi literature see Massignon l. c. 923.

⁶ With MS. عَجَل; Ed. عَجَل.

⁷ This characterization is no doubt the prejudiced view of a rational Sunnite. A more objective and more sympathetic definition is one which Massignon gives in his Lexique technique de la Mystique Musulmane, 99: that it is the recognition of "a divine element" in the "slightest action or phrases". It comes in a state of ecstasy where every word is realized in its fullness, so that the divine speech is heard in it, "au seul de l'unon mystique, intervient le phénomène de Shaiḡ, l'offre de l'échange, l'intervention amoureuse des rôles est posée; l'âme soumise est invitée à vouloir, à exprimer, sans s'en douter, «a la première personne», le point de vue même de son Bien-aimé; c'est l'épreuve suprême de son humilité, le sceau de son éléction".

were seduced by him¹. The theologians, the jurists and the Ṣūfis entertain various views regarding him². The majority of the theologians are inclined to condemn him as an infidel and to believe that he was of the persuasion of the Ḥulūliyya³. But several of the Ṣalimiyya Mutakallims of Basra⁴ accept him and class him with the mystical theorists of the Ṣūfis⁵. The Kādi Abū Bekr ibn al-Ṭab al-Ash'arī⁶ ranked him with those who are endowed with perspicacity and capacities for the preternatural⁷. In his work, in which he demonstrates the incapacity of the Mu'tazila to establish the distinctive features of prophecy on the basis of their principle, he mentions the supernatural deeds of al-Ḥalāḡi and the manner of his miracles.

The jurists have also been divided in their attitude to al-Ḥalāḡi. Abū-l-'Abbās ibn Suraj⁸ abstained from pronouncing an opinion when he was asked for one ¹ On his work and preaching in Baḡdād see Massignon, al-Halladi, 132 and 338-9. On Ṭalīkān see l. c., 77-80 and 337-8.

² Ikḥāl says: "...and people are still at variance respecting his true character, some extolling him to the utmost whilst others treat him as an infidel", l. 423.

³ This contention is refuted by 'Omar al-'Ordi (d. 1024 A. H.) Massignon, l. c. 395. In the discussion of his Ṣūfism, he takes up this question several times, 464-532.

⁴ According to Hujwiri, Kashf, 131, the Ṣalimiyya is one of the Ḥulūliyya sects. 1st, 60b identifies them with the Ḥashwiyya (see on them Houtsma's article, ZA, XXVI, 196-202 and my article, JAOs, liv (1934), 1-28). The fullest description of the sect is given in Ghanyūn, p. 61, upon which Goldziher based his sketch, ZDMG, LXI, 73-78. Among the heretical views are. 1) that in the resurrection God will be seen by everybody, including infidels and animals; 2) that Muhammad knew the Qur'ān even before it was revealed to him; 3) that Imān (faith) is one of God's names.

⁵ Massignon, l. c. 361, translates "to have realized the ideal set by Ṣūfism". On Ḥa-kīka in the sense of mysticism or inner reality see Kashf, 383-4, and Massignon l. c., 565-6. I owe my translation of the phrase to Nicholson, Kashf, 119.

⁶ Died, 403. He is generally surnamed al-Bakīlāni (Ikḥāl, II, 672), and he is called Ash'arī because of his adherence to the Ash'arite doctrine or because he is a descendant of Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī (so Sam'ani, s. v. Ash'arī). On his attitude to al-Ḥalāḡi see Massignon, l. c., 364-5.

⁷ l. c., 136-8.

⁸ Ed. and MS. عَجَل. He died 306. For his biography see Ikḥāl, II, 46 ff. and for his views Massignon l. c. 165-7.

regarding the forfeiture of his life¹. Abu Bekr ibn Dāūd² pronounced himself in favor of his execution. The religious leaders among the Sūfīs have also disagreed about him. 'Amr ibn 'Uthmān al-Mekki³ and Abu Yākūb al-Akbar⁴ (one-handed)⁵ and a number of others declared themselves free from him. 'Amr ibn 'Uthmān said: I was walking with him one day and recited something from the Kūr'ān. Thereupon he remarked: I can write compositions like it. It is reported that al-Hallāj one day passed al-Junaid⁶ and said to him: I am the Truth. Al-Junaid answered: You exist by the Truth. What a gibbet you will smear with your blood⁶. What al-Junaid remarked about him came true, for he was afterwards impaled.

248 Another group of Sūfīs have accepted him. Among them are included Abu-l-'Abbās ibn 'Aṭī' in Baghdād, Abu 'Abdallah ibn Khaṭīf⁷ in Fars, Abu-l-Kāsim al-Nasrābādī⁸ in Nīshāpūr, and Farīs al-Dīnawari¹⁰ in his province. Those who ascribe heresy

¹ Massignon, l. c. 164, correctly explains that this abstention is in accordance with the Murjite tradition. His Fatwa read: It is a man whose inspiration I cannot discern; therefore, I shall say nothing about him.

² Died 296, Ikhall, II, 662-5 and Massigron, I, c. 167-82. He was a Zahrite (see on his father Goldziner's Zahiriyya, p. 27-40). He was often consulted together with Ibn Surraij on legal matters.

²² Died, 297, Massignon l. c., 32-3; on his clash with al-Hallāj l. c., 56-9.

⁴ Al-Hallāj's father-in-law and secretary to al-Junaid (see following note); on his rupture with his son-in-law, ib. 62.

⁵ Called by Massignon Hallå's "spiritual director", 59 and elsewhere (for a definition of the term see Kashf, 55-7). He is a very prominent Sūfi. See Kashf, 126-30 and 188-99 and Massignon I, c., 33-6. The clash between the two is related, ib., 59-62.

⁸ A curious anecdote is told ib., 52, that during their first meeting al-Junaid already predicted al-Hallaj's end employing the same expression. On al-Junaid's capacity for pre-saging see Kashf, ib.

⁷ Died, 309. He was a devoted orthodox who died from stripes he received for defending al-Hallāj, Massignon, I, c, 260-61.

⁸ Died 371. He was a Zāhirite mystic, ib, 563-4. For a fuller description of him and his views see Kashf 247-51.

⁹ Ib. 159-60. He is the same as Ibrahīm Naṣrābādī cited in Massignon, l. c. 407. He died 372.

¹⁰ Died 342. He was an active adherent of al-Hallāj after the latter's death ib., 334 and 337, n. 7.

and the beliefs of the Ḥanūliyya to him relate that he said¹: He who mends his state by obedience, and restrains himself from² pleasures and lust, ascends to the sphere of the favorites of God. He shall then not cease to keep pure and he will mount on the steps of the purified until he will be freed from fleshly bonds. When there will not remain in him a particle of his material qualities, the spirit of God which was embodied in 'Isa ibn Mariam will become incarnate in him. In that state he will no sooner desire anything but it will be fulfilled as he desired it, and all his acts will be divine. They are of the opinion that al-Ḥallāj claimed to have attained this rank. They relate³ that some letters of his to his followers were seized, and in them the salutation read: "From Him who is Lord of Lords, who takes on any form, to His worshipper So-and-so". They also obtained possession of some letters which his followers sent to him and in them the superscription is: O Essence of pleasure and Object of the most Extreme Delights⁴. We testify that you are the One assuming some likeness at all times and in our time the likeness of al-Ḥusain ibn Manṣūr. We seek your protection and hope for your grace⁵, O knower of secrets". They tell that in Baghdaḍ he gained influence over a group of the Khalīf's retinue and harem⁶, so that the Khalīf Ja'far al-Muḥtadīr Billānī⁷, fearing the shame of his sedition, imprisoned him and consulted doctors of the Law for their opinion on the inviolability of his person. He lent a ready ear to the Fatwa of Abu Bekr ibn Dāūd authorizing his execution. He ordered

¹ The following alleged statement by al-Hallāj agrees very closely with the passage in Iḥāṭ, 209-10.

² Reading ع with Isf.; MS. and Ed. علي.

³ Reading ١٥٢٢ with MS; Ed. ١٥٢٢.

⁵ In this accusation against al-Ḥallāḡ, called in Arabic الرجعية, Massignon sees Shi'ite and not Sunnite influence. He even goes so far as to claim that Baḡdādī's list of the Ghulāt sects is nothing but a copy of Imāmiite heresiography, I, c, 138 ff.

⁶ The rather clumsy expression of our author is elucidated by the phrase in Isf. 61b, ḥaṣṣat min ḥawṣi al-ladī. But see the same expression in Iḥāq, 210. — Even the Khalīf's mother was impressed with him. See al-Tanṭhī, Nisḥwār al-Mihādāra, ed. Margoliouth, 83.

⁷ Khalīf from 295 to 320 A. H. See a vivid portrayal of him and his relation to the 'Abbāsid rule, Massignon, I. c. 199-206.

249 Ḥamid ibn al-'Abbās¹ to flay him a thousand strokes², and to amputate his arms and legs, and to impale³ him after that near the bridge⁴ of Baḡdād. This order was executed on Tuesday at three o'clock, six days before the end of Dhū-l-Ka'da in the year three hundred and nine. He was lowered from the scaffold to which he had been pinned and was committed to the flames. His ashes were thrown into the Tigris. Some of his devotees believe that he is alive and was not killed, but instead one on whom he stamped his likeness was executed. Those Sūfīs who cherish his memory hold that the states of divine grace were bestowed upon him, but he made them public. He was punished, in that mastery over him was granted to those who disavow miracles in order that his state might continue to be concealed. These believe that the essence of Sūfism is a state in which the esoteric is merely a disguise and the esoteric is sanctification. They cite in evidence of the sanctification of al-Ḥallāj's inner life what has been told regarding him, that while his arms and legs were being cut, he pronounced: It is the aim of the ecstatic to recognize the divine essence in its purity⁵. When he was asked one day about his creed⁶, he began to say: It consists of three letters which have no diacritical points and two which have, and his remark was cut short. But he meant Unity (Tawḥīd)⁷. Concerning the 'Azākirā⁸.—They are a faction in Baḡdād, adherents of a

¹ Abu Muḥammad Ḥamid ibn al-'Abbās (223-311) was the vizier of al-Muḥtadir. For his character see ib., 211-13 and for his machinations in bringing about al-Ḥallāj's end, 274-90, esp. 287 f.

² With MS. l-j: Ed. و.

³ Massignou points out, ib., 283, n. 4, that the story of his crucifixion is of Sūfī origin.

⁴ Over the Tigris, ib., 293, n. 5.

⁵ Ed. MS. and l-sf. 61 a use و in both clauses, so that it reads و, و, و. I follow Massignou, l. c., 324-28 and Nicholson, Kashf, 311 in reading و for the first. The translation is also Massignou's; see ib., and for his criticism of Nicholson's translation, 327.

⁶ Reading with l-sf. و, و; our reading و, if correct, may perhaps be a bit of dry humor.

⁷ See Massignou, ib., 127 for an explanation of the letters along the lines of Kabalistic interpretation. He also completes the statement.

⁸ It is hard to determine whether MS. reads و, و, or و with Ed. But several lines below the copyist definitely changed a doubtful reading into Z. and towards the end the Z is unquestionable.

man who made his appearance there in the time of al-Rāḡi¹ ibn al-Muḥtadir, in the year three hundred and twenty two. He was known as ibn Abu-l-'Azākir, but his real name was Muḥammad ibn 'Alī al-Shalmaghānī². He pretended that God's spirit was embodied in him and he named himself the Holy Ghost. He left a book to his followers which he called "On the Sixth Sense". He advocated explicitly the abrogation of the Law, and permitted sodomy³, maintaining that it was the communication of light from the superior one to the inferior. His followers allowed him to enjoy their wives, because of a craving for a communication of his light to them. Al-Rāḡi Billahī seized him⁴ as well as a group of his followers, among them al-Fusain ibn al-Kāsim ibn 'Ubdallah ibn Sulaimān ibn Warb⁵ and Abu 'Imrān Ibrahīm ibn Muḥammad ibn Ahmad ibn al-Munajjim⁶. He discovered their letters in which they addressed him as Lord and Master, and described him by his attributes of power over what he wished⁷. They admitted writing them. They confessed in the presence of the jurists, among whom were Abu-l-'Abbās Ahmad

¹ Khalfī, 322-329.

² This is the correct reading for the name which was given him after his town Shalmaghān, near Wāsit (I. A. VII, 215). Our text reads و. On the variants see Shāḥī II, 115.

³ I. A. viii, 219-20.

⁴ He was actually seized by ibn Muḥtadir, the vizier of al-Rāḡi, I. A. VIII, 217 and Yaḳūt, Iṣṣāḥ, III, s. v. Shalmaghān. On ibn Muḥtadir, who was vizier under Muḥtadir, Kābir and al-Rāḡi see Miskawāh, Eclipse of the 'Abbāsīd Khilāfa (Tr. D. S. Margolouth), I, 209-28, 272-300, 328-379.

⁵ Vizier under Muḥtadir, 319-30. His kunya is Abu 'Alī (Najm II, 286). I. A. ib. calls his grandfather 'Abdallah.

⁶ Yaḳūt, l. c., 206 calls him و و; l-sf., 61 b, و; He was a writer of note and the composer of a number of works. Yaḳūt's discussion of ibn Abu-l-'Azākir is given in connection with his biography of this author.

⁷ Two very interesting and curious tenets in the philosophy of ibn Abu-l-'Azākir are: first, that everyone in whom God is incarnate has a Satan who is his converse, so that his excellency may be more definitely demonstrated (Shāḥī, II, 116), and secondly, that everyone is a lord over the one below him in rank. A fine characterization of his views is given, I. A. VII, 218-20 and Yaḳūt, ib. An extract of the latter is translated in Miskawāh, l. c. part I. of translation at the beginning of the book (unpaginated).

ibn 'Omar ibn Suraj¹ and Abu-l-Farah al-Malik and a number of Imāms. The one called al-Ḥusain ibn al-Kāsim ibn 'Ubadallah was ordered to disavow ibn Abu-l-Azākīr and² to slap him³. He did so and repented publicly. Ibn Suraj ruled in accordance with the code of al-Shaffī, that the acceptance of his repentance was admissible⁴. But the Mālikite⁵ issued a decision rejecting the repentance of the Zaidī since he was seized against his will. Al-Rāḍī had him imprisoned until his case would be investigated⁶. He ordered the execution of ibn Abu-l-'Azākīr and his companion ibn Abu 'Aun. Ibn Abu-l-'Azākīr pleaded with him: Give me a three day respite, so that my guiltlessness may be demonstrated from heaven, or vengeance visited on my enemies. But jurists directed al-Rāḍī to hasten their execution. Thereupon he crucified them, burnt them, and threw their ashes into the Tigris.

¹ He is the same jurist who withheld from pronouncing an opinion in the case of al-Ḥalālī. See above, 81.

² With MS. ḡ; Ed. ḡ.

³ IA, VIII, 217-18 tells that this was required of Ahmad ibn Muhammad ibn 'Abdūs and of ibn Abu 'Aun. Ibn 'Abdūs did it, but Ibn Abu 'Aun's hand trembled, so he kissed Shalmaghānī's head and called him "my lord" and "my bestower". This will explain why he was killed together with his master.

⁴ Umm, I, 227.

⁵ Mālik is stricter with the Zaidī than with the other apostates because the former apostasize secretly so that they cannot be trusted even when they repent unless the confession is voluntary. See Goldziher, Musl. Stud. II, 215-16.

⁶ Both Yaḳūt and IA, ib. report that an offer similar to the one made to the vizier was also extended to ibn Abu 'Aun, but that he refused (see note 2). They further relate that ibn Abu 'Azākīr tried to disavow any connections with the letters in which he was called by divine names, but his testimony was proved false. — Friedländer, Shiites, I, 70, cites an edition of IH, which tells of the vizier's execution, but it is not substantiated. See I. c. II, 117.

THE ADVOCATES OF LICENSE AMONG THE KHURRAMIYYA¹ AND THE REASON FOR THEIR EXCLUSION FROM THE CATEGORY OF ISLAMIC SECTS.

These consist of two divisions. One of them was active before the Islamic Era. This was the Mazdakiyya² who permitted forbidden practices, holding that men are partners in property and women. The faction endured until Anushirvān killed them during his reign.³ The second division⁴ consists of the Khurramdīniyya⁵

¹ The significance of this term is not unanimously accepted. Van Vloten, in his work La domination arabe, le Chitisme, mentions that the Arabic scholars derive it from Persian ḡ, which signifies pleasure. L. H. Gray connects the name with Mazdak's wife Khurrama, who fled to Rai after her husband's execution and carried on her teachings under the name Khurram-dīn (ERE, VIII, s. v. Mazandaran; just, Iran. Namb. s. v. Khurrama, see below). The most probable explanation is that it is derived from the city name Khurram, for Yaḳūt, II, 427, informs us that Bābāk probably hails from there, although he himself also cites the interpretation from the Persian.

² Either founded or propagated (Noeldeke, Perser u. Araber, 456—7) by Mazdak. It is, of course, not surprising that our author stresses only what are to him the abominations of Mazdak's doctrine. But it was deeply religious and had some noble motives. See Noeldeke I. c., 458—61; Mirkhond, tr. by de Sacy, Antiquités de la Perse, 354; Shahrī, 192—4.

³ Chosrau, a great Persian emperor who reigned 531—79 was called Anushirvān (the blessed one) as a result, so the Arabic sources state, of his vigorous campaign in which he destroyed the Mazdakite heresy. Whether he did it as prince or as king is discussed by Noeldeke, I. c., 463—67. Our author, like the other Arabic historians, is of the opinion that he accomplished it after ascending the throne.

⁴ The association between these two divisions rests merely on the common characteristics of communism of property and wives. See Noeldeke, I. c., 461, against Blochet, ch. 5.

⁵ This name is used as an appellation for the sect interchangeably with Khurramiyya. Cf. for example, Muḥaddasī, 398, in which he identifies a mountain called Khurramdīniyya as the home of the Khurramiyya, adding, curiously enough, that they are Murjites. See also Blochet, 44—6 and Uşnī, 323; Siasat Nameh, 298 and Ash'ari 438.

who appeared since the institution of Islam. It split into two sects, the Bābakiyya and Māzyāriyya, both of which are known as the Muḥammiriya.¹

The Bābakiyya are followers of Bābāk² al-Khurrami³ who appeared in Jabal al-Badān⁴ in the district of Adherbaijān, and gained many followers. They considered all the prohibitions permissible and slew many Muslims. The 'Abbasid Khalīfah⁵ equipped many armies against them under Al-fīshīn⁶ the Chamberlain, Muḥammad ibn Yūsuf al-Thughūrī⁷, Abu Dulaf al-Jifī⁸ and their associates⁹. The armies continued to face him for a period of twenty years¹⁰, until Bābāk and his brother Ishāk ibn

¹ Lit. those apparelled in red dress. See Tab., Index, s. v., and Wellhausen, Arabische Reich (Eng. trans.), 533. Fihrist, 324, calls the Muḥammiriya the earlier of the two Muḥammiriya (sic). If explains the name as coming from the red dress which they wore during the time of Bābāk, 349.

² The following biographical note is taken from Flügel's article in ZDMG, XXIII (1869), 537—42. His father, whose name was 'Abdallah, lived in Badān and was an oil dealer. He also travelled to Adherbaijān. Bābāk was the child of an illegitimate union. A story is told that when he was ten years old his mother noticed a blood spot on his body and realized that he was destined to do great things. He was found by Jawwān b. Sahrik, a tribal leader in the mountains of al-Badān who enlisted him as one of his followers. When Jawwān died as a result of a battle with his opponent Abu 'Imrān, Bābāk was induced by Jawwān's wife to claim that the latter's spirit became incarnate in him. Bābāk did so and became his successor.

³ With MS.; Ed. عزري.

⁴ With MS. Ed. عزري. This may be his native city. See Muruj, VII, 123.

⁵ They were al-Ma'mūn and al-Mu'tasim. There was an attempt made to crush the rebels in 204 (Tab. III, 1038). In 205 'Isa ibn Muḥammad ibn 'Alī was sent against him but was defeated the following year (ib.).

⁶ So vocalized in MS. See Muruj, VII, 132. It is the famous general al-Ashīn whose real name was Haidar ibn Kāus. IA, VI, 182.

⁷ Abu Sa'īd Muḥammad b. Yūsuf had been sent previously against Bābāk and even dealt him a defeat (called the first one). ib.

⁸ De Goeje suggests that this general is perhaps the same as that mentioned Tab. III, 798, who was urged by Muḥammad b. 'Isa to join him in the revolt against Ma'mūn.

⁹ They are Muḥammad ibn al-Ba'īn and Bugha al-Kāthīn. IA, ib. and Nuzum, I, 656.

¹⁰ It need not be gathered that fighting was carried on during all this time. Al-Ashīn was first entrusted with the task in 220 (IA, ib.) but, as stated above, Bābāk's revolt commenced as early as 204.

Ibrahim¹ were seized and crucified in Surra-man-raa² in the reign of al-Mu'tasim. Al-fīshīn, the Chamberlain, was accused of lending assistance to Bābāk during the war and was, therefore, executed³.

The Māzyāriyya are the followers of Māzyār⁴ who proclaimed the rise of the 252 Muḥammiriya [among the Bābakiyya in one of the mountains of Tabaristān. After them the Kanjarat al-Muḥammiriya]⁵ in Jurjān is named. In their mountain retreat the Bābakiyya⁶ celebrate a festival-night when they gather over wine and song, and their men and women carry on promiscuously. When their torches and brands go ¹ This is the name, not of his brother, who was called 'Abdallah (Muruj, VII, 131), but of the governor of Baghdād who executed him. Tab. (Zotenberg) IV, 523 tells that he fought the Khurramiyya and defeated them previously and also participated in later attacks. It may be of course that a line fell out from our MS. but what argues against it is that Isf. B. 62a has مختار and that the same error reappears Ed. 268. It is surprising to find that Mukhtasar, 173 not only repeats this mistake but even traces the Isfahāniyya to him. For Ishāk ibn Ibrahim see Shi'ite II, 32 where the genealogy of the Muḥāfab family is outlined. It is curious that Makrīzī (Fagnan) 48, speaks of this Ishāk ibn Ibrahim as participating in a rebellion with 'Abdallah ibn Ma'mūn al-Kaddān in the days of al-Ma'mūn. See Fagnan's note ad loc.

² Originally Samarra but called by this name when Mu'tasim rebuilt it. (Lit. everyone who sees it rejoices). Mur., Califat, 513, n. 2. See also Maḥṣūdī, Tanbīh, 457.

³ History relates that al-Ashīn was executed after the defeat of Māzyār whom he incited to rebel against 'Abdallah ibn Tāhir, governor of Khurāsān, whose position he coveted. Al-Ashīn had already been provoked against the governor because the latter had revealed some dishonest deals by Al-Ashīn with moneys which he received. See IA, VI, 209 ff. and Browne, Lit. Hist. of Persia, I, 330 ff. Our author, however, consistently links al-Ashīn's act of treason with the Bābakiyya so as to give it a religious motive. See Ed. 268 (below). He was executed 266 A.H. IA, vi, 212.

⁴ His real name was Muḥammad ibn Kāren. Muruj, VII, 137 and 414 n. See also IA, VI, 202. His section occurred in 225.

⁵ The passage in brackets is omitted in Ed. The Arabic reads as follows: من الجيرة (بأن جيرة في بعض جبال طبرستان ولهم نسب قطرة الجيرة).

⁶ Mukhtasar, 163, ascribes this celebration to the Māzyāriyya, which is more reasonable, in view of their adoration of Sharwīn, (see below). Perhaps this is also the intention of our author who regards the Bābakiyya as the mother sect of the Māzyāriyya.

out¹ the men delflower the women, contending that it is a necessary practice.² The Bābākiyya³ trace the origin of their cult to a king of theirs of pre-Islamic times by the name of Sharwān.⁴ They believe that his father was Ethiopian and his mother a Persian Princess. They maintain that Sharwān was superior to Muhammad and to the other prophets. They have built mosques for the Muslims in their mountain⁵ and in them the Muslims are called to prayer. They teach their children the Kur'ān, but they do not pray privately nor do they fast in the month of Ramadan, nor do they concede the duty of making holy war on the infidels.

The sedition of Māzyār took on large proportions in his district⁶ until he, too, was captured in the days of al-Mutashim⁷, and he was crucified in Surra-man-raa next⁸ to Bābāk al-Khurramī.⁹ At present the followers of Māzyār in their mountain are composed of the peasantry which borders on the mountain from Sawād al-Jurjān. They feign Islam but secretly practise the opposite. But it is God whose help is to be sought against people of error and disobedience.

¹ Reading عاش with MS.; Ed. عاش. Since this sect is no doubt derived from the Zoroastrians it is hardly likely that they would intentionally extinguish a light as Ed. implies. Ist. reads عاش, 62a. An identical charge, it is alleged by Justin Martyr, was made against the early Christians. Dialogue with Trypho, in Ante-Nicene Fathers (Amer. Ed.), I, 199.

² Arabic عاش عاش عاش.

³ As pointed out in a preceding note it would be more correct to read Māzyārīya here.

⁴ Just. I. c., 290 identifies him with Sharwān b. Shurkha, ispehbed of Tabaristān, 712-97, who defeated the Arabs in 783 with the assistance of Vendad Hormuzd, Ia, VI, 131. (He is named there as Māzyār's grandfather). But see Albinui, 48.

⁵ This notice is very curious. Any friendly relations between them and the Muslims should be excluded a priori. We have in addition even better testimony of their enmity in a statement by abu-l-Faraj who relates that Bābāk's adherents, whenever they caught a man, woman or child who was a Muslim, would cripple and kill him. (cited ZDMG, XXIII, 541 n. 2). Fihrist adds عاش عاش عاش, 344.

⁶ Tabaristān in Khurāsān, Ia, VI, 202. His trouble started as early as 201. Tab. III, 1015.

⁷ He was caught by 'Abdallah ibn Tāhir, governor of Khurāsān against whom he had waged war in 224 A. H.

⁸ Muruj, VII, 138-9; Ist., ib.

⁹ With MS.; Ed. عاش.

THE FOLLOWERS OF THE DOCTRINE OF METEMPSYCHOSIS AMONG THE PEOPLE OF FANCY AND THE REASON FOR THEIR EXCLUSION FROM ISLAM.

Those who believe in metempsychosis consist of several divisions. One includes the philosophers, and another the Sumanīya¹. These two divisions existed before the rise of Islam. The two other divisions made their appearance since the institution of Islam: one from the Kadarīya and the other from the Ghulāt Rawāfiḍ.

The believers in transmigration among the Sumanīya assert the pre-existence of the world and also reject deductive and inductive speculation². They hold that nothing can be known save through the five senses. Most of them dispute the existence of the world to come and the resurrection after death. One faction among them believes in transmigration in diverse forms. They regard it as possible for the soul of a man to be transferred into a dog and the spirit of a dog into a man. Plutarch tells of a doctrine similar to this held by some philosophers. They maintain that whenever anyone commits a sin while in one body, punishment for it will place him in another body. They entertain a similar doctrine regarding reward. One of the most astonishing facts is that the Sumanīya profess metempsychosis, which cannot be perceived with the senses, despite their thesis that nothing can be known except through the five senses.

The Mānawīya also adhered to the doctrine of metempsychosis³, for ¹ Horten, Systeme, 93-6, classifies them as a Hindu group. See their views there. He identifies the name with Shraman (a Buddhist Monk). Arch. f. Gesch. d. Philos., XXIV, (1910) 144, n. 1. The article pp. 141-66 gives a detailed study of their views.

² See Horten's article referred to above. Uṣūl, 320 describes them as sceptics.

³ A. V. W. Jackson's article on the doctrine of metempsychosis in Manichaeism, JAOS, XLV (1925), 246-68 proves conclusively that the doubts expressed by some authorities hitherto, as for example, Bevan in his article ERE, VII, 399 and Kessler in the PRE, XII, 215 are not valid, particularly since there is no statement which must be necessarily interpreted as op-

Mānī says in one of his works that the souls which leave their bodies are of two classes: the souls of the righteous, and the souls of those involved in error. When the souls of the righteous leave their bodies they travel with the Pillar of Dawn¹ to the light which is above the heavenly sphere and remain in that world in eternal bliss. The souls of the sinful people, when they leave their bodies and wish to reach the Supreme Light, are turned back the other way to the lower world and are transferred into the bodies of animals until they are purged of the spots caused by unrighteousness.² Then they attain the Supreme Light.

The historians relate that Socrates and Plato and their disciples in philosophy professed metempsychosis³ along the lines which we have explained in the Book on Religions and Dogmas⁴. Some Jews profess transmigration. They claim to have found in the book of Daniel that God transferred Buktanassar into seven animal forms and beasts of prey, and thus punished him, until finally He transformed him into a believer in one God⁵.

As for the adherents of the Doctrine of Metempsychosis since the era of Islam, the Bayāniyya, the Janāhiyya, the Khattābiyya, the Rawandiyya⁶ among the Rawāfiḍ who profess incarnation, all accept the doctrine of the transfusion of God's posed to the doctrine. Prof. Jackson has certainly combed all the extant literature and recently discovered Chinese, Turkish and Pehlevi fragments. See I. c. 249, 261-8.

¹ Perhaps we should read قوله 'prayer' (pillar of praise) with Fihrist, 335. Cf. Jackson, I. c., 246 and 251, note 1.

² Same references as above.

³ Cf. Murāj, IV, 65-7.

⁴ Arabic Kitāb al-Mīḥal wal-Nihāl. The statement in Seelye, 9, that the book is preserved in a Constantinople library, which she took from Goldziher, ZDMG, LXV (1911) 350, has been denied by Goldziher himself and the error blamed on a careless reading of the title of the MS. by the cataloguer in the library. I. c., LXVI (1912), 165-6.

⁵ Daniel, III. That this information was also known to the Arabs is apparent from the fact that Ṭab. (Zotenberg), I, 571-2, relates that as a punishment for throwing Daniel into the Lion's den he was changed into a beast and lived among animals for seven years.

⁶ It is surprising that Baghdādī always mentions this sect casually and indirectly, although it is of such great importance. Ash'ari, 22-3, describes it as a mother sect from which both the Ruzāmiyya and Abu Muslimiyya branched out. For a full discussion of this sect see Van Vloten, La domination Arabe, le Chittisme, II, 121-4.

spirit in the Imāms. The first to teach this error were the Sabbābiyya among the Rawāfiḍ, claiming that 'Alī became a God ever since God's spirit was incarnate in him. The Bayāniyya hold that the spirit of God was transmitted through the Imāms¹ until it came to Bayān ibn Sam'ān. The Janāhiyya make a similar claim regarding 'Abdallāh ibn Mu'āwiya ibn 'Abdallāh ibn Ja'far. The assertion of the Khattābiyya regarding Abu-l-Khattāb is similar to theirs and so also the claim of a group of people among the Rawandiyya concerning Abu Muslim, the supporter of the 'Abbāsīd Caliphate. These profess the transmigration of the divine spirit but not of human souls. Far be He from any such extravagance.

Among the Kadarīyya a number of people accept the doctrine of transmigration. One of them is Ahmad ibn Ḥāṭī who was a Mu'tazilite, a disciple of al-Nazzām². He adopted the latter's innovation of the Leap³, his denial of indivisible particles⁴, and the denial of God's power to augment the pleasures of the inhabitants of Paradise or the tortures of the people in Hell. But he exceeded al-Nazzām by his blunder about transmigration. Another among them was Ahmad ibn Ayyūb ibn Yanūsh⁵. He was a disciple of Ahmad ibn Ḥāṭī in the subject of metempsychosis but the two of them differed later as to its manner. There was also Muḥammad ibn Ahmad al-Kaṭṭābi⁶. [He was a contemporary of al-Jubbā'i and adhered to Mu'tazilism, but added to it his innovation of metempsychosis, and wrote a treatise in proof of it. Another was Abu Muslim al-Ḥarrānī⁷ who cites al-Kaṭṭābi⁸ and glories in the fact

¹ Ed. reads "through the Prophets and the Imāms". My reading follows MS.

² For al-Nazzām's views see Ed. 113-32 (Seeley 135-157). The doctrine of metempsychosis is really a corollary to al-Nazzām's thesis of Kamūn (hiding) which our author does not recall here. Cf. Horten's article in ZDMG, LXIII (1909), 780.

³ Reading قوله with MS.; Ed. قوله. See Ed. 124-5.

⁴ Ed. and MS. read 'divisible particles', but this is an obvious mistake.

⁵ See on the variants of his name Shiites, II, 10 ff.

⁶ Ed. قوله; Isf., 63 a, calls him Ahmad ibn Muḥammad, Fihrist, 342 adds no further information about him. But see text towards end of chapter. See MS. passage in the next note.

⁷ According to Ibn Ḥazm as quoted by Schreiner, Der Kalām in der jūd. Phil., 62-63. (see also Shiites, II, 64) his name is Abu Muslim al-Khurāsānī; but this reading is unacceptable in view of the fact that our author calls him Ḥarrānī both here and below. Further, Abu Muslim al-Khurāsānī is probably the famous general of the early 'Abbāsīds and he was doubtless a Shi'ite and not a Kadarite.

⁸ The passage in brackets is omitted in Ed. In Arabic it is as follows: قوله قوله.

that he shared their view on both problems of Mu'tazilism and Tanasukh (metempsychosis). Finally there was 'Abd-al-Karīm ibn Abu-l-'Awjā', an uncle of Ma'an ibn Zā'id². He reconciled four kinds of heresies. In the first place he secretly preferred the tenets of the Manicheans among the Dualists³. Secondly, he believed in Tanasukh; thirdly, he favored the Rawāfiḍ on the question of the Imāns; and, fourthly, he held Kadariite views on the problems of justice and injustice⁴. He had invented numerous traditions bearing Sanads with which he deceived those who had no knowledge of the method of deciding between the false and true⁵. The traditions which he left are all blunders in anthropomorphism and divesting. In some of them he aims to contradict the precepts of the Law. It is he who led the Rawāfiḍ to abandon the inauguration of the last of Ramaḍān with the coming of the new moon by means of a calculation which he provided for them. He ascribed this calculation to Ja'far al-Sādiq. The story of this heretic was related to Abu Ja'far Muḥammad ibn Sulaimān, al-Mansūr's governor at al-Kūfa, and he ordered him

الجبلي وكان على مناصب الأعرال وزاد على الأعرال بدعه في التنازع وله كتاب في إنبات التنازع وسبق أبو مسلم الخزازي ذكر القحطبي

¹ See on him below.

² A well known general and governor who served under the 'Umayyads and went into hiding under the 'Abbasids. But when he saved the Khalīf al-Mansūr from the attacks of the Rawandiyya he was restored to their graces. He served respectively in Yemen and Khurasān where he slew many Khārijites until he was finally assassinated by them deceitfully. ET, III, 225

³ Fihrist, 338; Albiruni, 80.

⁴ Reading النجار with MS.; Ed. النجار.

⁵ Mizān al-Fitād, II, 144 calls him a Zandīk and a deceiver. He erroneously locates him at Basra.

⁶ There is confusion about the name of this governor. Tab. IA, Nujum, do not mention the Kunya Abu Ja'far. Our author and Albiruni who seem to have used the same source call him Abu Ja'far. (The person mentioned by this name [Khalīf, V, 85 lived much later]. The confusion comes no doubt from the fact that the Khalīf al-Mansūr's name was Abu Ja'far. Perhaps the translation should read: Muḥammad ibn Abu Sulaimān brought the report to Abu Ja'far, but the construction does not allow it. Isf. has Abu Ja'far ibn Sulaimān report to Abu Ja'far who was Muḥammad's brother. (Tab. III, 304, sqq.; Najm, I, 471). Copying al-Hāshimī who was Muḥammad's brother. (Tab. III, 304, sqq.; Najm, I, 471). Copying from al-Baghdādī, Isf. ib. carried the confusion still further in an attempt to straighten it out his own way.

to be executed¹. But 'Abd-al-Karīm said: Even if² you kill me I have already composed four thousand Ḥadīths in which I allow the forbidden and prohibit the allowed. I made the Rawāfiḍ break their fast during one of their fast days and made them observe a fast on one of the non-fasting days³.

The following is a detailed exposition of the views of these people on metempsychosis⁴. Alimad ibn Ḥāṭi maintained that God originally made His creatures pure of heart⁵, secure from evil, intelligent and mature, placing them in an abode other than the world in which they dwell at the present time. He endowed them with perfect reason and created within them a consciousness and knowledge of Him, and bestowed His grace upon them in abundance. He held that the person who was bidden and forbidden, the object of God's grace, is the soul which resides in the body; the bodies are frames for the souls. He was of the opinion that it is the soul which is endowed with life, power, knowledge and that all living beings are of one genus. He also held that all species of ¹ The circumstances in connection with this statement are reported more fully in both Tab. III, 375-7 and IA, VI, 3. Both of these authorities relate that the Khalīf wrote the governor to wait for his decision in regard to the execution, but that the governor executed him before receiving the Khalīf's approval. In fact he lost the governorship as a result of this step. Al-Mansūr's special care came from the fact that Abu-l-'Awjā' had influential friends at the court, ib., Albiruni, ib.

² Reading لن with MS.; Ed. لن.

³ Tab. ib., does not cite this story. IA, who tells it, does not refer it to the Rāfiḍite, nor does the Mizān, I, c. which is much briefer, making no reference to the fact at all. See, however, Albiruni, 76-80.

⁴ The doctrine about to be described in detail is ascribed by Naubakht, with as much detail as here, to the Khurramiyya, 32-34. In view of the close relationship between the Khurramiyya and the Bāṭiniyya, it must be said that the former seem to have been logically the originators, or at least expounders of this theory. According to IH, I, 91 the believers in Transmigration adduced as proof the verse "and into whatever form He pleased He constituted you", (Sura 82, v. 8) and "He made mates for you from among yourselves and mates for the cattle too, multiplying you". (Sura 42, v. 9). Ibn Ḥazm's explanation of these verses which is the accepted orthodox one will be found on f. 91, bottom. On the whole he dismisses the Muslim believers in this doctrine briefly by saying that Jimā' declares such people infidels. His argument is devoted in particular to the pagans.

⁵ Reading النجار with MS.; Ed. النجار.

animal life are charged with the duty of observance¹ and upon all of them ordinances and prohibitions have been imposed in accordance with their diverse forms and methods of expression. He asserted that when God bade them, in the abode in which He had originally set them, to feel grateful to Him for the grace which He had bestowed upon them, some heeded Him in all that 257 He had commanded them, while others disobeyed Him in all that He had commanded them. [Still others complied with Him in part of what He had ordained for them and violated the rest². Whosoever obeyed Him in all that He had enjoined upon him was left undisturbed in the pleasurable abode in which He had placed Him from the first³. Whoever disobeyed in everything that He had ordained was banished from the abode of pleasure to the abode of eternal torture, that is, Hell. Whoever fulfilled part of what He had commanded and violated the rest was brought forth to the earthly world and equipped with one of these bodies in the various forms of men, birds, animals, beasts, insects, and so on, which are solid moulds, and are afflicted with suffering and difficulties, hardships and fears⁴, passions and pains, in proportion to their sins and disobedience and the former abode in which He had created them. Now, he whose obedience in that abode outbalanced his disobedience, exists in a comelier form in this world, but he whose obedience in that abode was less than his disobedience exists in a homelier mould in this world. He further believed that the living being, which consists essentially of the soul⁵, will continue to reappear in various moulds and forms as long as his obedience is adulterated with iniquity. The grades of his mould, whether in the human or in the animal world, will be determined by the relative proportion of his merits and demerits. Moreover,

¹ This doctrine is disputed at length by IH, I 78—87 (part of it tr. in Asin, II, 190—6).

According to him, Ibn Hā'it proved his thesis by inference from two Qur'anic verses in one of which (Sura 6, v. 38) He calls all beings nations and the other in which He states that He sent messengers to all nations (Sura 35, v. 22).

² This passage is missing in Ed. The Arabic reads as follows: لا يرضى في بطنه ما اكرم وامرهم وخصه في بطن ما اكرم.

³ IH, I, 91, top. (Asin, II, 199).

⁴ Reading "لا" with Muḥtasar, 165; Ed. and MS. "لا".

⁵ Arabic: الجوارح التي من الروح. My translation is confirmed by Isf's reading: في الجوارح التي من الروح.

a messenger from God to every kind of living being will never cease to appear, and God's charge to the living being will always continue¹ until his works become pure obedience. Then he will be restored back to the abode of eternal bliss which is the abode in which he was created. On the other hand his works may become extreme disobedience²; then he is to be condemned to Hell and its eternal tortures. These are the teachings of Ibn Hā'it on Tanāsukh. 258

Ahmad ibn Ayyūb ibn Yanīsh³ teaches that God produced the complete creation with one fiat. Some of his adherents relate in his name that God first created the logical⁴ particles, everyone of which is indivisible. He held that those particles possessed intelligence and life, and that God made them uniform in all respects, so that none of them could claim superiority over the others; nor was any of them guilty of evil deeds on account of which it would be reduced to a position inferior to that of the others.

After He had amply bestowed His grace upon them, He offered them the choice between being tested by active obedience so that they might become deserving of reward for them, since the rank of merit is nobler than the rank of grace⁵, and between leaving them⁶ in this abode as an act of grace to them. Some of them preferred the test⁷, while others declined. Those who refused it were left in their first abode as heretofore. But those who preferred to be tested were tried in this world. When He tried those who preferred the trial, some disobeyed Him while others submitted. He reduced those who disobeyed Him to a station which is inferior to the grade in which He had created them. But those who obeyed He raised to a rank higher than the grade in which He had created them. Then He made them pass successively through persons and moulds until

¹ Makrizi, 347, cites verses in support of this contention. Schreiner, l. c., 63, states that Ahmad ibn Hā'it utilized certain verses. See also Goldziher, Richtungen d. Islamischen Kor'nanalegung, 309.

² Reading "لا" with MS.; Ed. "لا".

³ Ed. and MS. "لا": IH, VI, 198 states that he claimed a gift of prophecy saying that he was meant by the verse "لا" (Sura 61, v. 6)

⁴ Reading "لا" with MS.; Ed. "لا".

⁵ Reading "لا" with MS.; Ed. "لا".

⁶ Reading "لا" with MS.; Ed. "لا".

⁷ Reading "لا" with MS.; Ed. "لا".

a number of them became humans while others became animals or beasts in proportion to their sins. Those of them who became animal forms were relieved of the charge of obedience. He was at variance with Ibn Hā'it regarding the charge to animals. He said of beasts that they will be continually transformed¹ into ugly forms and that they will suffer affliction such as slaughter and the yoke until they shall have received in full that retribution which they earned for their sins. After that they will be restored to their ancient station. Then God will offer them a second choice of testing. If they select it He will reimpose upon them the task of obedience in the manner which we described. But if they abstain from it they will be abandoned to their actual state unburdened with any charge. He held that if any of those bidden to obey should perform deeds of obedience until he merited becoming a prophet or an angel he would have it granted by God. Al-Kaḥṭābi², who was one of them, held that God did not propose to them the burden of obedience at first, but that they asked Him for an elevation in their rank and for an opportunity to contend for superiority. He informed them that these characteristics could not be granted to them until after the imposition of obedience and the trial, and that if they accepted the charge and then disobeyed they would incur chastisement upon themselves. They declined the test and this, he said, is the meaning of God's word: "Surely we offered the trust to the heavens and the earth and the mountains, but they refused to be unfaithful to it and feared it. Man took it upon himself; surely he is unjust, ignorant"³ Abu Muslim al-Harrānī thought that God created souls and charged those among them which he knew would obey Him but not those who would disobey Him. The latter disobeyed him in the beginning and were punished alternately by metempsychosis and transformation into diverse bodies in proportion to their sins. This is an exposition of the beliefs of the adherents of the doctrine of metempsychosis. We have already destroyed their argument sufficiently in the Book of Religions and Dogmas.

¹ Reading ٢٢٢ with MS.; Ed. ٢٢٢.

² With MS.; Ed. ٢٢٢. Schreiner, l. c., 66, n. 3, says: "That Dualists adhered to the doctrine of metempsychosis we realize from the case of al-Kaḥṭābi". Where did he discover that al-Kaḥṭābi was a dualist?

³ Surā 59, v. 16.

AN EXPOSITION OF THE ERRORS OF THE HĀ'ITYYA AND THE REASON FOR THEIR EXCLUSION FROM ISLAM.

They are the followers of Ahmad ibn Hā'it¹ the Kadariite, a disciple of al-Nazzārī in Mūṭazilism. We discussed his views on metempsychosis previously. In this chapter we shall relate his blunders about the Unity of the Maker². Ibn Hā'it and Faḍl al-Hadāthī³ believed that the created universe contains two lords and two creators. One of them, eternal, is God, and the other, brought into existence, is 'Isa ibn Mariam⁴. They believed that Christ is the son of God by adoption,⁵ and not by birth. They also maintained that it is Christ who will call mankind to reckoning on the Day of Judgment. He it is whom God meant when He said: "Thy Lord and the Angel came in ranks"⁶ and it is he who will come "in the shadows of the clouds"⁷. It is he who created Adam in his image. This is the explanation of the tradition which has come down that God created Adam⁸ in His image⁹. He¹⁰ believed .ila, it is he whom the Prophet ¹ On the variants of the name of Ahmad's father see Shiites, II, 101.

² In addition to his heresies listed in this and the previous chapters he is accused by IH, IV, 197 and by Makrīzī, 347, of blaming the Prophet for his numerous marriages, claiming that Abu-Utharr al-Ghifārī (Et, I, s. v.) was more abstemious than he.

³ Ist. ٢٢٢. Intisar, 148, calls him .ila (see p. 222).

⁴ Makrīzī, 347; Shahr, 42.

⁵ Reading ٢٢٢ with MS.; Ed. ٢٢٢. We no doubt have here the traces of the Adoptianist heresy of early Christianity (Cf. ERE, I, 103—5, esp. par. 1—4). For the influence which Christianity exerted on these men their doctrine bears evidence. See also Shiites, II, 11.

⁶ Surā 89, v. 23. The orthodox translation of Malaḳ is as a collective. Baiḍawī, II, 402.

⁷ Surā 2, v. 206.

⁸ With Goldziher; Ed. and MS. .ila. Makrīzī, 347.

⁹ With Ed.; MS. ٢٢٢. I have not been able to locate this tradition. Its Biblical source is obvious. Genesis, I, 27.

¹⁰ I. e. Ahmad.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN.

THE HĪMĀRIYYA¹ AMONG THE KADARIYYA AND THE REASON FOR THEIR EXCLUSION FROM ISLAM.

referred to when he said: 'You will see your Lord as you see the moon when it is full'. It is he whom he meant when stating that God created the intellect and said to it: 'Come forward, and it came forward. Then He said: Step back and it turned back. Then He said: I have not produced a nobler creature than you. Through you I shall give and through you I shall take'. They asserted that Christ became embodied, but before his embodiment he had been the intellect.
'Abd-al-Kāfir says: These two non-believers have identified themselves with the Dualists and the Magians by affirming the existence of two creators. But their doctrine is more heinous than the doctrines of the latter. The Dualists and Magians ascribe the origin of all good to God and ascribe only the bad to Darkness or Satan. But Ibn Hāfi and Fadl al-Hādithi trace the production of all good to 'Īsa and even credit to him the reckoning with mankind in the world to come. The surprising point in their doctrine is that 'Īsa created his grandfather Adam. Is there anything more wonderful than a branch producing its root! Whoever includes these two erring sects within Islam is similar to one who counts the Christians among the sects of Islam.

¹ The tradition is found in all the collections. See Wensinck, s. v. Allāh.

² Shahr, 44 gives this tradition in greater detail. Goldziher who quotes this tradition from Ghazālī cites it as a definitely Neo-Platonic element in Islam, ZA, XXII, (1908) 318-9.

They form a group among the Mutazilites of 'Askar Mukram². They have selected some peculiar errors from the heresies of the various Kadariite divisions, adopted from Ibn Hāfi his doctrine of transmigration into bodies and frames, and subscribed to 'Abbād ibn Sulaimān al-Daimarī's³ view that those whom God transforms into monkeys and pigs become human after their transformation but turn infidels⁴. From Ja'd ibn Dīnham⁵, whom Khālid ibn 'Abdallāh

¹ The mystery surrounding this name (our author sheds no light on its origin: cf. Mukhtasar, 167 n. 1), can be solved to my mind by tracing it to the last 'Umayyad Khalīf, Mervān ibn Muḥammad, who was nicknamed al-Himār, and who, as Fihrist, 338, relates, was a Zandīk. See also IA, V, 329. It is noteworthy that this Khalīf was a pupil of Ja'd ibn Dīnham (see below) who plays a rôle in the formulation of the doctrine of the Hīmāriyya. Baghdadī's silence is doubtless due to his orthodoxy which restrained him from linking this heterodox sect to a Khalīf.

² This is the reading according to Yakūt, s. v. 'Askar, Makrizī (Fagnan) 40, reads Mukarram. It is a place near Kinzistān. While Yakūt speaks of it as a place of learned men, Mukaddasī, 410, calls attention to their heretical teachings; '... على فقهاء وأئمة علماء... فقهه لهم حتى نعلم المذکورون'. فقهه لهم حتى نعلم المذکورون. فقهه لهم حتى نعلم المذکورون. Goldziher quotes a passage acc. to which the place was a Mutazilite nest in 1156, Islam, III (1912) 219. It is significant that 'Abdallāh ibn Ma'mūn al-Kaddāb, the Karmatian leader, was also a native of this town. Blochet, 67.

³ With MS. الجیسی; Ed. الجیسی. 'Abbād (and not Ubād as Seelye, 147, reads or as Nyberg, Intisar, 203 allows) was a Mutazilite who argued that it is wrong to say of Allāh that He created the unbelievers since their unbelief could not have been created by God. Lisan-al-Mizan, III, 229-30 (he calls him الجیسی which resembles our reading and not that in Ed. 147 and Nyberg ib.) says that he lived in the days of al-Ma'mūn.

⁴ Makrizī, 347.

⁵ The following biographical information is recorded about him in Fihrist, 337-8: He was a teacher of Mervān ibn Muḥammad whom he converted to Zandikism. But Hishām ibn al-Kasri offered up as a sacrifice, they have adopted the thesis that when deductive proof leads to knowledge, that knowledge becomes an act without an agent. In addition they hold that wine is not a product of God but is the work of the vintner, because God will not produce what will be a cause for disobedience. They believe that man creates several species of animal life. For instance, when a man buries flesh or places it in the sun so that it breeds maggots, they hold that these maggots are man's creation. Similarly the scorpions which appear in straw under baked bricks are believed to have been produced by the one who combined the baked bricks and straw¹. They are more heretical than the Magians who ascribe the origin of serpents, creeping things and venomous snakes to Satan. Whoever counts them among the sects of the community is like him who counts the Magians among the sects of the community.

Abd-al-Malik finally executed him after he had kept him in prison for a long time. It is told Ja'd's family brought the story of his imprisonment to Hishām and complained about its lengthiness. Hishām was surprised to hear that he was still alive and ordered Khālid to kill him. The latter executed him on the Sacrifice Day after accusing him of Zandikism from the pulpit. The editor of Ibn Kufayya, Ishlīlīlī fī-Lafih, 56, n. calls him the first one to have asserted the created character of the Kurān. See also Najm, I, 367 and IV, V, 196-7.

¹ Makrīzī, ib.

THE YEZĪDIYYA AMONG THE KHAWĀRJ AND THE REASON FOR THEIR EXCLUSION FROM ISLAM.

They are the followers of Yezīd ibn Abu Unaisa¹ the Khārījī, a native of Basra. Later he removed to Tun² in the land of Persia, and followed the doctrines of the Ibādīyya among the Khawārij. Then he renounced the faith of the entire community³ by preaching that God will appoint an apostle from among the Persians and will reveal to him a book from heaven, and will abrogate the Law of Muḥammad with his new Law. He held that the disciples of the awaited prophet are the Ṣābiāns spoken of in the Kurān. The people of Wasīṭ and Ḥarrān who go by the name of Ṣābiāns are not the Ṣābiāns mentioned in the Kurān⁴. In addition to his error he befriended anyone among the People of the ¹ The founder of the sect which still exists to this day is one Yezīd whose personality has not been determined. According to some, e. g. Sam'ānī s. v. Yezīd, he is identical with the 'Umayyad Yazīd ibn Mervān. But our author's statement is the more correct. See Isya Joseph's Devil Worship.

² Near Kūhīstān in Persia, between Herat and Nīshāpūr. Isf. B. reads ٢٢٠ and Isf. P., ٢٢٠ (or ٢٢٢). The probable reading is ٢٢٠. Both Tun and Khur are towns in this mountainous region and Yezīd may have gone to either of these two. Muḥaddasi, 301 and more fully 321; Yakūt, IV, 201 f. s. v. Kūhīstān.

³ Ash'ari and Shahr. do not include this group among the Ghulāt but discuss it as a sub-sect of the Ibādīyya (Ash'ari 102, ff. and Shahr. 100-02.)

⁴ Chwolson, in his study of the Ṣābiāns, also adopts this distinction between the Ṣābiāns who are discussed in the Kurān and those of Ḥarrān, I, 11-22. He states that the latter took this name on the advice of a jurist when the Khalīf al-Manṣūr persecuted those who did not profess a revealed religion (13-14). An exposition of the Ṣābiāns of the Kurān will be found ib. chapter 5, and of the Ḥarrāniāns, 139-541, esp. 158-180. Pedersen, who differs with Chwolson regarding the nature of the original Ṣābiāns does not want to recognize the two types. See his article in Oriental Studies to E. G. Brown, 383-91.

Book who confirmed the prophetic character of Muhammad even if he did not join his Religion, and in view of that called them Believers. According to this theory the 'isawiyya and Ra'yāniyya¹ among the Jews are necessarily believers since they have acknowledged the prophetic character of Muhammad, but do not join his community. There is nothing which can allow anyone who regards Jews as Muslims to be counted as one of the sects of Islam. How then can he be counted among Islamic sects who predicts the abrogation of the Law of Islam?

¹ The reading is unmistakable, but in all probability the Yūdghāniyya or Shadghāniyya are meant, see above 37, note 6. Goldziher's remark in his review of this book, in which he argues against the possibility of the appellation to be derived from his name al-Rā'i may give us the clue to this name. See Friedländer's remarks in support of this reading, JQR, NS, III (1912—13) 284-5 and notes. Albritton, 18, lists two false prophets one of whom is Abu 'Isa al-Istahāni and the other al-Rā'i (no doubt Yūdghān) see REJ, xii (1886), 259—60. Kirsāni relates that Yūdghān was called "The Shepherd" by his followers. — Hebrew Union College Annual, vii, 328.

THE MAIMONIYYA AMONG THE KHAWĀRIJ AND THE REASON FOR THEIR EXCLUSION FROM ISLAM.

They are the followers of a man among the Khawārij of Shihir¹ whose name was Maimūn². He belonged to the school of the 'Ajārida³ among the Khawārij. Later he contradicted the 'Ajārida in the matter of God's will, human free-will and the power to act, adopting on these three dogmas the doctrines of the Kadariyya who deviate from the truth. In addition to this, he held that children of polytheists dwell in paradise. If this Maimūn had satisfied himself with these heresies which we have related and had not added any other errors, we should have classed him with the Khawārij for branding 'Alī, Talḥa, al-Zubair, 'Ā'isha and others as infidels⁴, and for calling sinners infidels; [we should have also classed him] with the Kadariyes for his opinions on the problems of will, free-will and power to act, which conform to those of the Kadariyya. But he exceeded the Magians. He permitted men to marry the daughters of the children of common grandparents and the daughters of the children of brothers and sisters⁵. He argued: In the prohibitions against marrying certain women be-

¹ This rendering is somewhat doubtful: MS. apparently reads شير, which makes no sense. Ed. reads شير. Shihir is a town in S. Arabia, Yāqūt, s. v. That there were Khawārij in that district is clear from Ibn Hāuḳal, 32. Yet Ash'ari, 95, locates him in Balkh.

² Shahr, 96, transmits his name as Maimūn b. Khālid. Makrizi, 354, and if give his full name as Maimūn b. 'Amrān.

³ Ed. 72—82 (Seeleye 94—104). As in the case of the Yazīdis, our author is more conservative than the other authorities in classing them with the Ghulāt. Ash'ari, 93, 354 and Shahr, 96 enumerate them among the Khārījites.

⁴ This is a cardinal dogma with all Khārījite sects. See Seeleye, 75.

⁵ These are forbidden relations according to the four most important orthodox rites See Syed Amer 'Alī Mohammedan Law (1929) II, 277; Ahmad Shakir, Mohammedan Law of Marriage and Divorce, 25.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN.

CONCERNING THE BĀṬINIYYA¹ AND THE REASON FOR THEIR EXCLUSION FROM ALL THE SECTS OF ISLAM.

Know — may God make you prosper — that the damage caused by the Bāṭiniyya to the Muslim sects is greater than the damage caused them by the Jews, Christians and Magians; nay, graver than the injury inflicted on them by the Materialists and other non-believing sects; nay, graver than the injury resulting to them from the Antichrist who will appear at the end of time. For those who, as a result of the missionary activities of the Bāṭiniyya, have been led astray ever since the inception of the mission up to the present time are more Although our author is consistent in calling this sect Bāṭiniyya it is, nevertheless, known by many other names, most of which, no doubt, date from the period later than Baghdādī. Some of these names are connected with persons; others, like the Muḥammītiya, are not usually employed as epithets for this mystical sect. Ijī, 348, mentions seven laḳabs, with explanations: Bāṭiniyya, Ḳarāmiya, Huramiyya, Sab'iyya, Bābākiyya, Muḥammītiya, Isma'īliyya. Goldziher in Streitschrift, p. 37, lists the following ten names: Bāṭiniyya, Karāmiya, Ḳarāmiyya, Khurramiyya, Khurramīniyya, (the last two are not treated separately by our author; see above p. 87), Isma'īliyya, Sab'iyya, Bābākiyya, Muḥammītiya, Ta'īmiyya. Silsat Nemeš, p. 250, however, has the following ten: Isma'īlī (Aleppo and Cairo), Karnat, (Bagdad, Ma-wara-i-nahr and Ghazna), Mubareky (Kufa), Rawendi and Burquoy (Basra), Khalely (Rai), Muḥammītiya, (Jurjan), Mubaryida (Syria), Saliy (Maghreḥ), Djenneby (Aḥsa and Bahrain), Baitiyy (Isfahan). The Mubareky sect is mentioned by Shahrastāni p. 128 and by Baghdādī p. 47 (Seeley p. 66) as an Imamiyya group, (the latter unnecessarily makes them adherents of Muḥammad's children rather than of Muḥammad himself. They are borne out by Naubakht, 58.

Baghdādī even mentions the Isma'īliyya as a branch of the same main division (p. 39; Seeley p. 60), but in the discussion on page 56 (Seeley p. 65) he relegates them to the Ghulāt. They applied to themselves the term Ta'īmiyy (on the meaning of this name see Streitschrift, p. 5 ff. and page 38.)

cause of consanguinity, God specified only mothers, daughters, sisters, paternal aunts and brothers' daughters and sisters' daughters¹. But he did not specify daughters of daughters or sons, nor daughters of brothers' children, nor daughters of sisters' children. If he carried his analogy further to mothers' mothers and fathers' mothers and grandfathers' mothers, he would become a thoroughgoing² Magian. But since he does not permit the marriage of grandmothers, for he infers the rule governing grandmothers from the prohibitions against grandmothers' mothers, he is compelled to apply the principle governing children of one's own loins to children of children. If he does not pursue his analogy this way, his argument is destroyed.

Al-Karābisi³ relates that the Kharijite Maimūniyya disacknowledge the Sūra of Joseph as part of the *Qur'ān*⁴. But to disavow part of it is like disavowing it all. Whoever permits to himself any of the prohibited laws adheres to the cult of the Magians, and Magians are not counted among the sects of Islam.

¹ Sūra 4, v. 27.

² The Ait of جدي which appears in Ed. seems to be erased. I therefore adopt the reading جدي rendering it as above. Brockelmann's emendation جدي is not borne out by MS.

³ Al-Ḥusain ibn 'Alī ibn Yazīd al-Karābisi (and Karasi as in IH, IV, 190). He was a famous Shaḥīḥe of the third century A. H. He died 244. See IKhan, I, 416 and LA, VII, 34.

The information cited above is probably drawn from al-Karābisi's Kitāb fi-Māḳāṭāt, characterized by Fakhr-al-Dīn al-Rāzi's father as سائر أهل الأثر في معرفة ملوك العرب في الملوك, مجلد Tabāḥī, I, 252.

⁴ See Noeldeke-Schwally, Geschichte des Qurans, II, 94.

numerous than those who will be led astray by the Antichrist when he appears, since the duration of the sedition of the Antichrist will not exceed forty days'. But the vices of the Bāṭiniyya are more numerous than the sand-grains or the raindrops.

The heresiographers relate that a number of people laid the foundation for the Bāṭiniyya movement. One of them was [ʿAbdallāh ibn] Maṣmūn ibn Daiṣan,² known as al-Ḳaddāḥ, a mawla of Jaʿfar ibn Muḥammad al-Sādiq and a native of Ahwāz. Among them was also Muḥammad ibn Ḥusain, surnamed Dhaidhān,³ [and several ¹ Ist. 62a adds: And the sedition of these appeared in the days of al-Maṣmūn and it still endures.

² Despite the consistent use of the name Maṣmūn (see his and his son's biography in Massignon's article in Studies Presented to F. G. Browne, 330–31) in our text here and elsewhere, which is generally supported by Ist, and despite the skilful calculation of Casanova in JA, 1915, pp. 5–17, esp. pp. 13–15, in which he credits this account, the correct reading in the particular instance under consideration is 'Abdallāh ibn Maṣmūn as Ist. reads here. For even if Maṣmūn, to judge by the account given of him in Ia, VII, 21, may, in a sense, be regarded as the founder of the sect and, according to Casanova (ibid.; see below), may, together with his son, have hoped for an overthrow of Arab rule in 194 a.H., the details of the career in the following passage do not at all tally with his biography as we know it from other sources, but agree well with the career of his son. The epithet al-Ḳaddāḥ (the oculist) is applied by some authorities to the father (e.g. Fihrist, p. 186, قاضي العين) and de Goeje p. 13 and p. 15), by others to his son (e.g. Ia, ib.). Even our author declares (Ed. p. 16. Seeley p. 35) that 'Abdallāh was the founder of the sect.

It may also be added that the alternatives upon which we are compelled to fall back, if we should adopt Casanova's conclusions in the said article are far-fetched. For one thing he asks us to recognize two Zaidians or Dhaidhāns or to perversely discern two individuals in the two variant readings. It is even more difficult to assume as he does that the Bāṭiniyya movement was made up of a series of attempts rather than a well planned conspiracy which reached its successful climax with the establishment of the Fāṭimid dynasty in 296, as it is described by most historians. But the strongest argument against his view is that Baghdādī whom he calls 'Bāṭin informé' (p. 13) tells (Ed. 277 below p. 131 and in Uṣūl p. 329) that the founders of the movement which commenced in the days of al-Maṣmūn (198–218) were Ḥamdān Ḳarīmī and 'Abdallāh ibn Maṣmūn al-Ḳaddāḥ, grandfather of the chief of the Bāṭiniyya in Egypt.

³ Ist. B. 65 a, reads جابر. Ist. P. 86 b, جابر, Fihrist, 188–222, جابر, Ia, 21, جابر; editor mentions that one of his MSS. reads جابر. Maḳrīzī (Fagan p. 45) gives his name

other people called descendants of Ḥamdān Mukhtār who met the one called Dhaidhān¹ and [ʿAbdallāh ibn] Maṣmūn ibn Daiṣan in the prison of the ruler of ḡlāk. In that prison they formulated the religion of the Bāṭiniyya. Their doctrine appeared in public, after their liberation from prison, through the activities of the one called Dhaidhān. He commenced his missionary work in the district of al-Jabal². Many of the Kurds of al-Jabal as well as the inhabitants of the mountain named el-Badān³ joined his religion. Then [ʿAbdallāh ibn] Maṣmūn ibn Daiṣan journeyed to the province of al-Maghrīb and there claimed to be descended from 'Akīl ibn Abū Ṭalīb⁴, pretending that he was an offspring of his. After a number of the Ultra-Rawāfiḍ and the Ḥuṭūliyya responded to his call, he pretended that he was one of the children of Muḥammad ibn Ismaʿīl⁵ ibn Jaʿfar al-Sādiq. The simpletons⁶ accepted this from him despite the information⁷ possessed by the genealogists that Muḥammad ibn Ismaʿīl ibn Jaʿfar died leaving no progeny⁸.

as Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥusain ibn Dīḥan Bakhtīr. According to Fihrist, 188 Dhaidhān was secretary to Aḥmad ibn 'Abd-al-'Azīz ibn Abū Dulaf who ruled c. 265. But Massignon in his article on Ḳarmathian Bibliography op. cit., p. 331, gives the following biographical notice of "Dindān": Abū Jaʿfar Aḥmad ibn al-Ḥusain ibn Saʿīd al-Ahwāzī, died at Kumm c. 250. He was not 'Abdallāh's accomplice, but his disciple. He was a famous traditionalist, and before his conversion belonged to the Khurramiyya. He wrote the Kitāb al-Iḥtiṣāḥ. He may be the same as Aḥmad ibn al-Kayṣāl.

¹ The passage in brackets, missing in both Ed. and MS., is taken from Mukhtasar, 170. I have not been able to obtain any information regarding the clan of Ḥamdān Mukhtār.

² Ist. B. reads جابر while P. reads جابر. According to Yakut s. v. al-Jabal, it is the same district as the one now called Irak. The word Jabal is omitted in Ed.

³ This is a mountain in Azerbaijan and is the birthplace of Bābāḳ al-Khurramī as well as the scene of his activity. See above p. 88 and note.

⁴ See Maḳrīzī (Fagan), 40. For the genealogy of this family see Ibn Kuyūtaḳa, Kitāb al-Maʿārif, 102–3.

⁵ The allegiance to Ismaʿīl ibn Jaʿfar accounts for the name Ismaʿīliyya by which this sect is sometimes known. Although Jaʿfar divested his eldest son of the Imamate because of the latter's addiction to wine drinking, the Ismaʿīliyya claimed that Jaʿfar, being infallible, could not revoke what he once had granted. See Blochet p. 49 and Browne, Literary History of Persia, I, p. 393. (Both of them draw from the same source). Cf. especially Naubakhtī, 57–8.

⁶ Read جابر with MS; Ed. جابر.

⁷ Read جابر with MS; Ed. جابر.

⁸ Although our author makes the same statement Ed. p. 47 (Seeley p. 66), there are

Later there arose a man known as Ḥamdān Ḳarnai¹ and summoned the people to the faith of the Bāṭiniyya. He was nicknamed thus because his handwriting was crabbed, or perhaps because he minced his step². He had been at no sources for it to my knowledge. Blochet 35, in speaking of Muḥammad says "He had several children who fled to Khorasan". Wüstenfeld in his genealogical tables (Geschichte der Fatimiden, 13) also lists several children, and similarly Huart in his article on the Alids in El, I s. v. and de Sacy, Introd. p. 67. De Goeje takes it for granted that Muḥammad ibn Isma'īl had children (p. 50-67, et passim), similarly Naubakhtī, e. g., 90, and elsewhere, and Makrīzī (Fagan) pp. 36-37. Perhaps our author was misled by a statement in Tab. III, 2218 (1A, vii, 353), regarding Ibn Zikrī's spurious genealogy to the effect that أبو الحسن بن علي بن أبي طالب. In view of Naubakhtī's statement to the contrary, it is improbable that Baghdādī's contention is of Imāmīte origin. A similarly curious denial of the existence of the twelfth Imām of the Twelvers is made by Ibn Ḥazm and cannot be traced by Friedländer. See Shītes, I, 48 and ii, 53.

¹ Ḥamdān (Stassel Nameh, 269, gives his name as Mubarek doubtless a confusion with Mudrak, Mawla of Isma'īl b. Ja'far, and founder of the Mubārakiyya sect. Naubakhtī, 58) Ḳarnai, after whom the Ḳarnaijans, one of the most important sub-sects in the Bāṭiniyya movement, are called, was converted by Ḥusain al-Ahwāzī (Makrīzī, I, 396; Wüstenfeld, 7; Blochet, 63, etc.; yet cf. Fikrist, 187), a missionary of Aḥmad ibn 'Abdallah ibn Ma'mūn al-Kādāḡ, and later became active himself as a propagandist in Ḥāḡ, making his first appearance in 274 (de Sacy Introd., 166), or 277, 1A, vii, 309 ff. For a full biography of him and of his brother-in-law and associate, 'Abdān, see de Sacy, Introd., 166-200. De Goeje, who, on the authority of Ibn Ḥaukal, believes with de Sacy that Ḥamdān and 'Abdān finally repudiated the secret conspiracy and again became loyal supporters of the 'Abbāsids (p. 210), disagrees with him nevertheless about the cause of this defection, maintaining that it came as a result of the establishment of the Fātimid dynasty by 'Ubadallah, the former chief of the Ḳarnaijans in Syria. Cf. 57-69.

² The meaning of the nickname Ḳarnai is not ascertained. According to Ikhlaḡ (Iḥar, III, 335), and 1A, vii, 311, it was the name of his Syrian employer who was red-eyed (Kar-mila in Syriac), or of the one who carried him on his donkey when he lay ill on the road (1A, ib. 310). Massignou, (Bibliogr., 329) is also inclined to see in it a Syriac word but with the reading Kurmalā, which would correspond to the Arabic word Talās, (concealment), the sixth degree of initiation, see below p. 144. See de Goeje, 199-203. Our author's interpretation finds support in Stassel Nameh, 269. Naubakhtī, 61, simply relates that a nickname given to Ḥamdān, who was a Nabatean. He makes the significant remark that the Mubārakiyya group is earlier than the Ḳarnaijans.

the beginning of his career one of the farmers of Sawād al-Kufa¹. To him the Ḳarnaijans owe their name. After him, Abu Sa'īd al-Jannābī², who was one of the converts that had adhered to Ḥamdān³ began his missionary activity for this heresy. He subdued the country of Baḥrain⁴, and the Banu Sanbar⁵ joined his call. Then, after a long time had elapsed, the one called Sa'īd al-Ḥusain ibn Aḥmad ibn 'Abdallah ibn Ma'mūn ibn Daḡan al-Kādāḡ appeared among them. He changed his name and his pedigree; he declared to his followers; I am 'Ubadallah ibn al-Ḥasan ibn Muḥammad ibn Isma'īl ibn Ja'far al-Sādiq⁶. Then ¹ 1A, vii, 310, (also reproduced de Sacy, Introd., 172 ff.), tells of his rise to power from the farming profession. According to that report his occupation was only a ruse employed by him to further his missionary activity. But Wüstenfeld, ib., believes him to have been sincere in his extremely religious practices.

² For a detailed account of the activities of this powerful leader and the characterization of his personality see de Goeje pp. 31-47 and p. 69 ff.; de Sacy, Introd., 211-216. He was killed by a slave in 301 and was succeeded at first by one son (Abū-l-Ḳāsim Sa'īd) and by his designated successor Abu Tāhir Sulaimān, when the latter became mature, in 305 A. H. (217).

³ He was converted by Yahya ibn al-Mandi (de Sacy, Introd. p. 212). De Sacy himself is inclined to the view that Abu Sa'īd was sent directly by Ḥamdān Ḳarnai, whereas de Goeje, p. 31, attributes his appointment to 'Abdān, Ḳarnai's brother-in-law and a leading figure in the plot (see on 'Abdān, de Sacy, I, c. p. 154 ff.).

⁴ Whether his first mission was to Baḥrain is fully discussed by de Goeje p. 37 ff.

⁵ He married the daughter of al-Ḥasan ibn Sanbar (de Goeje p. 37; Iḥauk, 210; Sunbūrī). The Banu Sanbar were an important family in al-Āḡṣā. See Iḥauk, p. 21.

⁶ Fikrist, 187, gives the following order for the succession: 'Abdallah, his son Muḥammad, his son or brother Aḥmad (called Abu Shalāḡa, sometimes Shalaghagh) and Sa'īd ibn al-Ḥusain ibn 'Abdallah ibn al-Ma'mūn (al-Ḥusain having died before his father). De Goeje, 21, favors this order: 'Abdallah, his two sons Ḥusain and Aḥmad (Abu Shalaghagh) and Ḥusain's son Sa'īd-'Ubadallah. Makrīzī, I, 396, lists them as follows: 'Abdallah, Aḥmad, his sons Ḥusain and Muḥammad Abu Shalāḡa.

The entire problem of the credibility of the Fātimid claims to be descendants of 'Alī has not been and probably will never be definitely settled (Cf. Ibn Ḥammād's Rois Obaidites, tr. Vondenhuyden, Arabic II, French 17). While some reject unhesitatingly any and all of their claims, others are equally convinced that they are true descendants of Fātima. But just as the former are probably prejudiced for religious reasons (or political, especially among the Shītes) the latter may have been influenced by some equally strong considerations. See 1A,

They tell that al-Ash'ir, commander of the army of al-Mu'tasim, joined their movement, and dissimulated¹ with regard to Bābā al-Khurrami. Al-Khurrami was the leader of a rebellion in the district of al-Baddein. The people of his mountain were Khurramiyya after the fashion of the Mazdak cult, and the Khurramiyya joined forces with the Bā'iniyya. A body of three hundred thousand men, made up of the people of al-Baddein and of those of the Dailamites who joined them, gathered around Bābā. The Khalīf sent al-Ash'ir to wage war against them, believing him to be genuinely devoted to the cause of the Muslims, whereas he secretly sympathized with Bābā. He, therefore, procrastinated in his war with him and disclosed the places of concealment of the Muslim forces to him, so that many of them were killed². Then reinforcements reached al-Ash'ir, and Muhammad ibn Yūsuf al-Thughri³ as well as Abu Dulaf al-Kasim ibn 'Isa al-Jili also joined him. Later on General 'Abdallah ibn Tāhir came to his aid, but the valor of the Bābākiyya and the Karmatians triumphed over the Muslim armies to such an extent that the latter erected for themselves the city known as Berzend⁴ for fear of a night attack⁵ by the Bābākiyya. The struggle between the two parties continued for many years until God granted victory to the Muslims over the Bābākiyya. Bābā was taken prisoner and impaled in Surra-

¹ I have chosen the reading جـاـه of Isf. B, f. 65 b, instead of the word تـاـه of Ed. and MS. which does not suit the context.

² It goes without saying that the wholesale accusation hurled against al-Ash'ir, and to a certain extent, perhaps even his heretical tendencies are chiefly the result of prejudice and have no historical foundation. All historians are unanimous in lavishing the highest praise on Ash'ir's campaign against Bābā. Even the charge made at the trial about an attempt to save the Khurrami from execution was directed against Ash'ir's brother and not against the general himself. As for the suspicions about Ash'ir's concealed sympathies with his former faith, it is probably true that they were based on fact. But it is equally clear that his fall came not on account of his religious views, but much more probably for "purely political reasons" (Browne, Lit. Hist. I, p. 334). See the full description of the trial in Tab. III, page 138, sqq. (trans. Browne, l. c., pp. 331-36).

³ On these leaders of war see above, 88.

⁴ MS.: مـجـز; Ed.: مـجـز. Berzend is a city near Tiflis where al-Ash'ir made his encampment. It had been a deserted place prior to that. Yāqūt, s. v. and l. a., VI, 316.

⁵ Reading جـاـه with Mukhtasar, 173 and apparently MS. See also Brockelmann, Mondé Oriental, XIX (1925), 88. Ed. جـاـه.

man-ra in the year two hundred and twenty three. Then his brother Ishāk¹ was seized and crucified in Baghdad together with al-Māz'yār², commander of the al-Muhammira in Tabaristān and Jurjān. After Bābā was killed the perfidy of al-Ash'ir and his treacherous behavior towards the Muslims during his wars with Bābā became known to the Khalīf. He therefore ordered him executed and impaled, and he was duly crucified.

The historians tell that those who laid the foundation of the cult of the Bā'iniyya were descendants of the Magians who were still attached to the religion of their ancestors, but did not dare to make a public avowal of it, dreading the Muslim swords. The ignorant among them used to appoint an Asās³, who was entrusted by them with the teachings of their faith and who secretly preferred⁴ the precepts of the Magians. They interpreted the verses of the Kur'ān and the traditions of the Prophet allegorically in accordance with their fundamentals.

The proof of this contention is that the Dualists maintain that Light and Darkness are pre-existent Makers, Light being the creator of the good and useful and Darkness the creator of the evil and harmful. Bodies are blended of Light and Darkness. Each of the two includes four humors, namely: heat, cold, moisture and dryness. The two primary sources together with the four humors regulate this world.

The Magians share with them the belief in two makers, but they maintain that one of the two Makers is pre-existent; he is God, the author of the Good. The other, Satan, a created being, is the author of Evil. Now, the spokesmen for the Bā'iniyya state in their books that God created the Soul; God is, therefore, the First Cause and the Soul is the Second⁵. These two regulate this world.

¹ His brother's name was not Ishāk but 'Abdallah. See a discussion of this above, 89, note 1.

² See above, 89.

³ The Asās is a man whose task it is to instruct the members of his sect in the fundamentals of the sectarian beliefs. Although the term properly belongs to the beliefs of the Bā'iniyya, Baghādī has extended its meaning as in this case. On the Asās see below, 134. Perhaps the reading in Mukhtasar, 174, ought to be preferred: جـاـه³ مـجـز³.

⁴ Reading جـاـه with Mukhtasar, ib. and Goldziher, Ed. J.

⁵ Shahh. 147-8 (Haarbr., 222) explains that both the intellect and the soul are God's creations, He Himself being transcendental. But see Streitschrift, 44 where Ghazālī speaks of

They call these two the First and the Second, but generally they name them 'Ahl (Intellect) and Na'is (Soul)'. They declare, in addition, that these two regulate this world through the regulatory powers of the Seven Planets and the Primary matter². [But³ this is an acceptance of the teaching of the Dualists, that Light and Darkness govern the world by the emanation of the primary matter⁴]. Their view that the First and Second Causes regulate the world is exactly like the view of the Magians about attributing all created substances to ⁵ two Makers, one of whom is pre-existent and the other generated⁶. Only the Bāḥiniyya designate the two Makers

النسب (Universalserie) and النسب (Universalserie) See also Guyard 185-6, 286, 295
النسب (Universalserie) and النسب (Universalserie) See also Guyard 185-6, 286, 295
note 13 etc. Cf. esp. the long note below.

¹ Ivanov, Ismaelitica, 25 and note 6, recommends the translation "Living Powers" instead of our translation "Soul".

² The recurrence of the word זַי below induces me to accept the reading of Ea. and MS. as the correct one (perhaps more probably זַיִל) and to translate it as primary matter, one of the five emanations of God. The seven planets may be interpreted as Space and the fifth emanation—Time—, which is ordinarily included, should be regarded as eliminated here, just as it is in the Salisbury Fragment (JAOS, II, 1849-50, pp. 299, 306). It is also possible, however, to read זַיִל with Mahātmasur, 175 and Isf., t. 66 a, instead of זַיִל , rendering it "the four elements", and to consider all these as metaphorically employed for the primary matter from which they have developed. See, indeed, Guyard, ib. and Shahn, ib.

ولهذا لتحقيق قول الشنوية ان النور والعلمية: Ed, MS.: The sentence in brackets is missing in Ed, MS.:
بدران العالم بترتيب الجبال الاول.

⁴ Ivanow, l. c., relates Baghdādī's exposition of the Bāḥiṭe belief in two makers to their belief in the Imām who is an incarnation of the Godhead. P. 11 note 37 and also p. 25.

⁵ MS. 31; missing in Ed.

⁶ It seems to me that Strothmann, after quoting this statement by Baghdādī, raises an unnecessary difficulty in attempting to solve the question as to who the two Makers could be. (EI IV, p. 738, s. v. Thaawiyā). Massigron, in the article Karmānīn (EI, II, p. 767 ff.), to which Strothmann refers, speaks of an 'ʿAlī and 'Nafs', both of which are begotten. But, as already pointed out above, Baghdādī, unlike Shahrī, fails to make this distinction and calls the 'ʿAlī God and the 'Nafs His creation, although it always remains an open question whether the more elementary Baghdādī or the more philosophical Shahrī is nearer to the actual teaching of the sectarians. Of course, in order to make Baghdādī's statement sound more profound, it may be possible to identify the 'ʿAlī with the nūr shaʿshāʿarī as Strothmann does (ib.), but we have no grounds for calling the 'Nafs with him the nūr zuḥūmī. Besides, Baghdādī's charge that we does not necessarily compel us to recognise a principle of light and darkness in the doctrine as First and Second, whereas the Magians speak of them as Yazdān¹ and Ahrahmān. This is the intrigue concealed² in the hearts of the Bāhīrya. They have appointed an Asās who is to initiate people into it. They could not practise the worship of Fire³ openly, so they resorted to artifice by instructing the Muslims. It is proper that all Mosques be fumigated with incense and that an incense-burner be introduced into every mosque in which at least ambergris and aloë-wood be placed. The Baramika made a suggestion to al-Rashīd in an enticing manner that he set an incense-burner in the interior of the Ka'ba in which aloë-wood should continually be burnt. Al-Rashīd realized that with this they aimed at the worship of fire in the Ka'ba, desiring that the Ka'ba become a fire-temple. This was one of the reasons for al-Rashīd's arrest of the Baramika⁴.

of the Bāḥiyya, but merely two makers. However, it is interesting that Browne in following the idea of God as distinct from the 'Aḥl later comes across a difficulty in that "in the correspondence between the Grades of Being and the Isma'ili hierarchy there seems to be a lacuna, since God, the prime unknowable Essence, is represented by no class in the latter" Lit. Hist., I, 409). Certainly, on the basis of Baḥdā'īs presentation the lacuna would not occur. See also Guyard, 185-6 where Baḥdā'īs standpoint is adequately explained. For, although the 'Aḥl is really begotten, it, nevertheless, "Primitivement se confondait avec lui (God). Aussi peut on considérer la Raison Universelle comme la véritable Divinité des Ismaélis...", 186. Cf. also 293 note 10.

Curiously, an emanation of the 'Akl' from God is also reported in a tradition in Ghazālī, Ihya' and also above p. 100. See Goldzher, Z.A., XXII (1908) p. 319-20.

¹ Yazdān is the name for Ahuramazda. Shahr, 181 (Haarbr., 275).

² The rendition of ya as above is somewhat unusual; Beyer, in Studies to F. G. Browne, p. 66, cites a verse from the Kitab al-Aghani where the phrase ya ya occurs in the sense of "suggested itself to me".

³ MS. يُعْرَان; Ed. يُعْرَان.

⁴ The religious factor is nowhere put forth so definitely as by our author as a major cause of the fall (187 A.H.) of the Barmecids, a powerful Persian family that occupied a most important position in the government from the rise of the 'Abbasids on (they were already court favorites under the 'Omeyyads, Bouvat, 36-7). On the contrary, owing to the lustre of their wealth and position (see, e.g., the life of Ja'far Ibn Yaqra al Barmaki in Ikhail [i.e. de Slane, I, 301-315], himself a descendant of the Barmecids [Bouvat, 9]), a Sunniite even as orthodox as 'Ibarrî is very obviously displeased with their assassination by the command of al-Rashîd [Tab. [Zotenberg] IV., Ch. 100; see also Bouvat, 94 ff.]. However, there is no doubt that their religious views were not in conformity with Islam (Bouvat, 81 and 83, note 1). Their ancestor

After the Bāṭiniyya had interpreted the fundamentals of religion in polytheistic fashion¹, they also employed artifice in interpreting the precepts of the Law in such a manner as would entail the abolition of Muslim law or lead to the adoption of tenets similar to those of the Magians. What corroborates the fact that this was their intention in their allegorical exposition of the Law is that they allowed their adherents to marry daughters and sisters and they allowed wine-bibbing and all other sorts of dissipation. This is confirmed with even greater certainty by the fact that the fellow who appeared in their midst in the Bahrein and in al-ʿAḥsāʾ after² Sulaiman ibn al-Ḥasan³ al-Karnajī instituted the practice of sodomy among his followers and prescribed a death-sentence for the boy who refused to yield to one that wished to have sexual relations with him. He decreed that a man's hand be amputated if he extinguished a fire with it and that his tongue be cut out if he extinguished it with a puff. This youth is the one called ibn Abu 271 Zakariya al-Tammami⁴, who appeared in the year three hundred and nineteen. His Barmat's services in a Buddhist temple (mistaken by Arab authorities as Zoroastrian, e. g., Baḍʿat-Tarikh VI, 102) is generally attested (Muruj VI, 414. See Barthold in El I, s. v. Barmakides, 691 and also El, ib. 693). Ia, VI, 119, who offers several explanations for the fall of the Barmecides does not mention their Zoroastrianism. Tab, III, 572 and 669 reports a charge of heresy against the Barmecides, but by no means so explicit as that of our author, a parallel to which I have not been able to discover elsewhere. Their ruin is probably due primarily to the jealousy which the Khalīf conceived on account of the tremendous power which they gained in his day (Bouvat, 75 ff.). On the story of al-Rashīd's love for his sister ʿAbbāsa and her marriage to Jaʿfar al-Barmakī in conformity with the Khalīf but with the express command not to live with him conjugally, said by many to be the cause of the family's fall, cf. Bouvat, 113 ff. He himself does not lend much credence to the story.

¹ MS. ʿḥ; ʿḥ; missing in Ed.

² The chronology here is wrong, although it is in accordance with our author's view that Sulaimān was killed in 318 A. H., see below, 126 and note 9. The accepted view is that he died in 332, de Goeje, 142. Indeed, according to accounts reported l. c., 130 and 132, it was Abu Tāhir Sulaimān who was misled by him first. Massignon, El, II, p. 769 also says of ibn Abū Zakariya that he was "enthroned by Abu Tāhir". On Sulaimān son of Abu Saʿīd al-Jannābī see below p. 120 ff.

³ With MS., Ed. Ḥusain.

⁴ With MS., Ed. ʿḥ¹. The depravities of ibn Abu Zakariya or Abu ʿI-Faḍl al-Zakari al-Tammami as he is called by Massignon who characterizes him (El, ib.) as "a madman", "a uprising lasted until God granted mastery over him to the person who slew him in bed'. What confirms even more positively all that we have asserted regarding the inclination of the Bāṭiniyya to the religion of the Magians is that we cannot discover on the face of the earth any Magian who does not sympathize with them, and does not hope for their conquest of the country, believing that the government will thereby be restored to them. The ignorant among them generally adduce proof for this belief from what the Magians tell in the name of Zardusht, who predicted to Kushnasp² that the rule would pass from the Persians to the Romans and Greeks; then it would be restored to Persia. Afterwards it would pass from the Persians to the Arabs and would finally be restored to Persia. Jāmāsp³, the astrologer, sustained him in this prediction, holding that the kingdom would return to the Persians upon the completion of one thousand five hundred years from the time of the appearance of Zardusht⁴. Among the Bāṭiniyya there lived a man called Abu ʿAbdallāh al-ʿArādī⁵ who boasted a knowledge of astronomy⁶ and was kind of Heliogabalus⁷ are reported in virtually the same words by Albirūnī in his Chronology (Tr. Sachau), 196 who also adds that "he called upon people to recognise him as lord, and they followed him". De Goeje also cites other reports, 129 (his attempt to connect other accounts of a false Mahdi with this strange individual is rejected by himself in his article in Jd, 1895, 27). Cf. Masʿūdī, Tanbih (tr. de Vaux), 497.

¹ He was slain by order of Abu Tāhir, see Albirūnī, ib., and de Goeje who quotes him, 131, and gives a fuller account, 132-3. His uprising endured for eighty days, (ib.).

² With MS., Ed. ʿḥ¹, I. e. Vishtaspa, a Persian "king or princely ruler" who was the first convert to Zoroaster's faith in, what is generally agreed upon, the city of Balh. See A. V. W. Jackson, Zoroaster Ch. 5, 56-68.

³ Jāmāsp, said to be a son-in-law of Zoroaster (Jackson, l. c., 21), was a counsellor to the king and an ardent disciple of the Prophet, ib., 76.

⁴ According to Albirūnī, l. c., 196, the end of the period as predicted by Jāmāsp fell in 1242, Seleucid Era (930-31).

⁵ Albirūnī, ib., calls him al-ʿAdī. He is followed by Casanova, in Jd, 1915, 10. Sachau's conjecture that he is to be identified with Abu ʿAbdallāh al-ḍāʿī can hardly be maintained in view of the reading in our text. Samʿānī lists both nishās, but it is noteworthy that ʿAdī is definitely Persian as can be judged by the several proper names in the article under this heading and the city of Nasaf (Nakhsheb) cited there.

⁶ For the important role which astronomy and astrology play in Mohammedan life as well as for the interpretation of the conjunctions, cf. de Goeje, 117-122. See also the very important discussion by Casanova, l. c., 8 ff.

a faustical Magian. He has written a work in which he stakes that the eighteenth conjunction¹ after the birth of Muhammad corresponds with the tenth millennium², which is also the period of the return of Jupiter³ and Sagittarius. He says⁴: Simultaneously with that phenomenon a man will arise who will restore the Magian regime and will gain control over the entire land. He believes that that man will reign for a period of seven conjunctions⁵. They say; the truth of the prediction of Zarādušt and Jamāsp has been demonstrated by the transfer of the kingdom of the Persians to the Romans and Greeks in the days of Alexander; then it returned to the Persians at the expiration of three hundred years⁶. Afterwards the rule of the Persians was again transferred to the Arabs, but it will certainly revert to the Persians at the end of the epoch which Jamāsp forecast. The time which they set coincided with the reigns of al-Muktafi and al-Muktadir⁷, but the event foretold by them failed of realization and the government did not then come back to the Magians.

The Karmatians had before this fixed date agreed among other things that the expected Mandi would come forth in the seventh conjunction in the fiery trigon⁸. Sulaimān ibn al-Ḥasan from al-'Aḥsā⁹ came forth¹⁰ relying on this as-

¹ The eighteenth conjunction (the sixth in the fiery trigon) came in the year 298-9, A. H. Casanova l. c., 10.

² The tenth Millennium is doubtless an echo of the Persian belief in the world-ages, see ERE, v. 376. Albirūnī's statement disagrees to some extent with that in ERE. See Albirūnī, 17 and esp. the section on the chronology of the Persians, 107 ff.

³ Acc. to Albirūnī, 197, the reading should be Saturn.

⁴ See this passage almost verbatim, though a little more fully ib., 197 (cited by Casanova l. c., 10).

⁵ Albirūnī reads seven and a half ib., line 8.

⁶ The Persian Empire fell in 312 B. C. at the hands of the Seleucids, and was restored by the Sassanids in 226 A. D. so that 538 and not 300 years passed. See Hart, Ancient Persia, 219 ff. Albirūnī, 121, also arrives at the same results, but he adds on line 31 that most authorities believe it to have been an epoch of some 300 years.

⁷ Al-Muktafi reigned 289-295, and al-Muktadir 295-320 A. H.

⁸ See Casanova, l. c., 10 at the bottom. Brockelmann who changes ṣ. y to ṣ. v (Monde Oriental, XIX [1925] 198), and translates it "im zweiten Drittel", has misunderstood the passage.

⁹ With Goldziher and Mukhtasar 177 against Ed. and MS. which read ṣ. y.

¹⁰ Abū-Ṭāhir probably became chief of the Karmatians in 310 or 311 A. H. See a full account of his activity in de Goeje, 75-142.

sumption, and he attacked the pilgrims to Mecca and he slew them notoriously. Later he entered Mecca, killed all those who were performing the circuit (Ṭawāf), seized the veils of the Ka'ba, and cast the slain into the Zemzem well. He crushed many Muslim armies, but in one of his battles he was forced to flee to Hajar¹. He then addressed a poem (Kaṣīda)² to the Muslims in which he declared:

If my retreat to Hajar has deceived you regarding me,
Then³ shortly news will indeed reach you.

When Mars rises over the land of Babylon⁴,

And the two stars⁵ will be in conjunction with him, then beware, beware!

Am I not the one mentioned in all the Scriptures?

Am I not the one announced in the Sūra of the Companies⁶?

Verily, I shall rule over the people of the earth East and West.

As far as Kairuān of the Greeks, Turkey and the Khazars.

By the two stars he meant Saturn and Jupiter⁷. This conjunction took place during the years of his activity; yet he did not hold sway over any part of the world save the town from which he hailed. He coveted a reign lasting for a 273 period of seven conjunctions, but he did not reign seven years, for, indeed, he was killed in Hīt⁸ when from her roof a woman hurled a brick on his head ¹ The capital of Bahrain, which province is also often called Hajar. See below, 123 and de Goeje, 36 ff. and 43 ff.

² The verses below constitute only a part of the poem. Nuzūm, II, 239 contains a longer version, although it lacks our third couplet. But even there we do not obtain the complete text as is apparent from the word ṣ. y, which interrupts the sequence of the quotation twice. De Goeje in his translation combines the stanzas of both Nūjūm and Albirūnī.

³ MS. ṣ. y; Ed. ṣ. y.

⁴ Both de Goeje's translation, 114, and Sachau's, 197, are based on a reading in Albirūnī which I do not have before me. Judging from note 1, de Goeje, ib., Albirūnī's variant reads like Ed., but is declared by the Dutch scholar to be "absolument fautive". Instead he renders it "Et que son influence ne sera pas effable par celle des deux astres". See his argument against our reading on p. 123.

⁵ MS. ṣ. y; Ed. ṣ. y.

⁶ Sūra 39. De Goeje conjectures that the allusion may be to v. 38, 114.

⁷ A conjunction of these two planets is especially disastrous for the 'Abbāsids, since it announces the victory of the Karmatians. De Goeje, 123.

⁸ A town near Baghdād, Yaḩnū, IV, s. v. See below, 126 and note 8. Hīt was stormed in 315 A. H.

and brained him. A man slain by a woman is the most contemptible among the slain and the most despicable among those lost. At the end of the year one thousand two hundred and forty of the Alexandrian Era, one thousand five hundred years had elapsed since the age of Zarādušt¹. Yet in that year the domination of the world was not restored to the Magians. On the contrary, the belt of Islam was extended over the earth after that year, and God conquered for the Muslims the land of Belāsāghin² and the land of Tibet³ and most of the provinces of China. Then He further conquered for them all of the land of India, from Langhān⁴ to Kannawj⁵. The land of India down to Tatar(?)⁶ by its seashore all became part of the expanse of Islam in the days of Yamin⁷-al-Dawla Amin-al-Milla Mahmūd ibn Subūktekin⁸. This sums up the aspirations of the chiefs of the Bāṭiniyya, and ¹ The same fact is indicated by Albirūnī, 196-7, though he places the completion of the 1500 years in 1242 Alexandrian Era and relates it to the death of Abu Zakariya.

² More correctly Bālāsaghūn (see Yakūt, I, 708 and de Goeje, Bibl. Geogr. index Vols. 1-3, s. v.). It is in Central Asia (its location cannot be defined exactly, see Barthold, EF, I, 614). The latter, I, c, 615, does not fix a definite date for its conquest, but in c. 340 A. H. a Mohammedan prince occupied its throne. In the 10th and 11th centuries of the Christian Era it served as the capital of the Khans of Turkestan. Arnold, Preaching of Islam, 216, note 2.

³ With Goldziher and probably MS. Ed. ج. ١.

⁴ With MS.; a city in the Ghazna district, Yakūt, IV, 343. Langhān was captured by his father Subūktekin in 366 A. H., IA, VII, 505. Ed. reads: ج. ١.

⁵ With MS. and Goldziher. A large town in Central India, west of the Ganges River. Albirūnī (India, tr. Sachau, 199) speaks of it as being mostly in ruins, but possessing an illustrious history during the period when the capital was situated there. On the other hand, Istakhri, 9, and Ibn Haukal, 16, declare it to be still the capital city. Māḡadasi, 480, also describes it as a thriving town and summer resort. The conquest of India, resembling, to a large extent, the perilous expedition of Alexander the Great is narrated in Utbi, Khaḡ-i-Yamīn, (tr. Reynolds), 449-62.

⁶ See Goldziher's note ad loc. His reference to Yakūt is unfortunately misprinted. Ed.: ج. ١.

⁷ With MS. Ed. ج. ١. In accordance with a custom instituted since the appearance of the Buwāhid Dynasty, Mahmūd received these honorific titles from the Khalīf al-Kādir in 999 A. D. (Yamin al-Dawla was bestowed on him later). EF, III, 133.

⁸ With MS. Mahmūd of Ghazna's career and deeds as well as his court are well portrayed in Müller, Der Islam im Morgen-und Abendlande, Vol. II, 48-70. A very of the Magians who believe that Jamāsp predicted the restoration of that kingdom to them. But they suffered the evils of their enterprise, and the outcome of their desires brought extinction upon them with the glory of God and His providence.

Then 'Ubadallah ibn al-Ḥasan arose among the Bāṭiniyya in the province of Kairuān and beguiled a group among the Kutama, and a number of people among the Maṣāmida, and masses of dull-heads¹ among the Berbers, with magic² and necromancy by which he, concealed under an upper and lower garments, conjured up apparitions of images before them at night. The ignorant thought that they were miracles performed by him. In consequence of this they followed him in his heresy and he gained mastery over them in the land of Maghreb³. Then the one called Abu Sa'īd al-Ḥusain ibn Bahram issued from their midst against the inhabitants of al-Aḡsā' and al-Kaḡī and Mesopotamia. He led an attack by his followers against his enemies, took their women and children captive, and burnt 274 copies of the Kur'ān as well as mosques. Then he captured Hajar, killed its men and enslaved their children and women. Then the one known as al-Sanādīkī⁴ appeared in al-Yaman and slew many inhabitants, killing even children and women. Another one, Ibn al-Faḡl⁵ by name, joined him together with his followers but God delayed biography of him will be found in Utbi, I, c, his official biographer. See also the article in EF, III, 132-35.

¹ With MS. ج. ١ here and passim where Ed. reads ج. ١. Goldziher has pointed out that this word has no sectarian sting, being applied to Sunnites as well. ZDMG, xxxvi (1882), 281-2.

² Reading ج. ١ with MS: Ed. ج. ١. This accusation has been hurled against the entire family of Ma'imūn, from whom 'Ubadallah is believed to be descended. IA, VII, 21.

³ See above, 112.

⁴ Under the year 207 A. H., Nuḡim, I, 595, mentions Sanādīkī who appeared in Yemen, led people astray from Islam and finally perished in a plague, but he says nothing about his affiliations with the Karmāḡians. In the light of this information it will be surprising that our author passes in silence over the man who figured most prominently in the Karmāḡian movement in Yemen — Abu-l-Kāsim al-Ḥasan ibn Faraj ibn Ḥawshab ibn Zādān al-Manṣūr. However, van Arendonk, Opkomst van het zaitillische Imamāt in Yemen, 110, n. 8, reports that al-Manṣūr is called al-Sanādīkī by several authorities, and terms Nuḡim's statement an anachronism. See a short account of al-Sanādīkī's activities in Makrīzī's Itihāz al-hunafā' bi-Akḡbār al-A'imma al-Khulafā' (ed. Banz), 113-4.

⁵ Tab. III, p. 2256, relates a victory over the defenders of Ṣan'a by a missionary whom marginal glosses in two MSS. name ج. ١ ج. ١. According to Janati's story of the turned them and their followers over to the destructive power of gangrene and the bubonic plague, and they died¹. Then there came forth in Syria a grandchild of Maimūn ibn Daiṣān, called Abū-l-Ḳāsim ibn Mithrawaih², and these two³ said to whomever followed them: This is the time appointed for our rule. This occurred in the year two hundred and eighty nine. Subuk⁴, al-Muṭāḍid's general, set out against them. They slew Subuk in the field of battle, entered the city of al-Ruṣāṣa⁵ and burnt its general mosque⁶. Afterwards they directed their course to Damascus. Al-Ḥamānī⁷, a slave of ibn Ṭūlūn⁸ faced them and drove them to Raḳḳa⁹. Then Muḥammad ibn Sulaimān, the secretary of al-Muktafi, sallied forth against them with one of al-Muktafi's armies¹⁰ and routed them and killed thousands of them. Al-Ḥusain¹¹ ibn Zikrawaih ibn Mithrawaih was forced to flee to al-Ramlah¹², but the Karmajians in Yemen as told in Kay, Omarah, Hist. of Yamana, 191—212. 'Alī ibn Fadl, an associate of al-Mansūr, was a depraved individual who, after becoming powerful, renounced his allegiance to the Mahdi and was finally poisoned by a doctor in 303 A. H. In a recent work on the history of Yemen by 'Abd-al-Waṣī' ibn Yahya al-Yamani, ibn-Faql is said to have proclaimed himself a prophet and to have abrogated the law. IA who tells his story VII, 22, calls him Muḥammad.

¹ Maḳrīzī, op. cit., ib.

² This Abū-l-Ḳāsim ibn Mithrawaih is Yahya ibn Zikrawaih (Tab. III, 2218 and IA, VII, 383) whose genealogy Nowairi traces to al-Ḳaddāh (de Goeje, 60).

³ The two spoken of in this passage are probably Yahya and his brother Ḥusain. IA, VII, 362 sqq.

⁴ Tab. III, 2219, reads الملك; IA, VII, 353 reads ملك although he cites several MSS. with the reading ملك.

⁵ A city in Syria near Raḳḳa, built as a summer home by the 'Omayyads, but some believe that it is pre-Islamic. Yaḳūt II, 784.

⁶ Tab. ib.; IA, ib. For the history of this uprising see de Goeje, 47—50.

⁷ Badr al-Ḥamānī was one of the generals of the Egyptian Army which was sent to reinforce Ṭaḡhl ibn juḥf, governor of Damascus. IA, VII, 362. Tab. III, 2219 calls him Badr al-Ḳaḥīf.

⁸ He was the slave of Abū Mūsā Ḥarām ibn Khumārāwaih, died 292 A. H. Zambaur, 93. Ms. reads حارث; Ed. حارث.

⁹ A town on the Euphrates, three days from Ḥarrān, Yaḳūt, II, 802.

¹⁰ 291 A. H., Tab. III, 2137 sqq.

¹¹ MS. and Ed.: الملك. He was known as "the fellow with the Mole" الملك مع الحمار. Tab. III, 2224, passim.

¹² Al-Ḥusain was captured not at Ramlah but in Dāliyah, a town not far from Kūfa, governor of al-Ramlah seized him and conveyed him together with a troop of his followers¹ to al-Muktafi. He executed them in Baḡhdād on the highway after torturing them severely². With their death, the power of the Karmajians was broken down until the year three hundred and ten. Afterwards the uprising of Sulaimān ibn al-Ḥasan³ took place in the year three hundred and eleven. It was then that he captured al-Basra⁴, killed its chief Subuk al-Muḥḥi⁵ and carried off its booty into Mesopotamia. In the year three hundred and twelve, on the tenth day before the end of the month of al-Muharram, he attacked the pilgrim caravan at al-Ḥabir⁶, slew most of the pilgrims, and led their wives and children in captivity. He next entered Kūfa⁷ in the year three hundred and thirteen, put its inhabitants to death, and pillaged their possessions.

In the year three hundred and fifteen he fought with ibn Abū Sāy⁸, took him prisoner, and routed his men. In the year three hundred and seventeen, he entered wither he had hoped to escape unnoticed. But the prefect of the town recognized him and delivered him to the Khalīf in Raḳḳa. See Tab. III, 2237—46 and IA, VII, 366—7.

¹ Acc. to Tab, Karmajians resident in Baḡhdād were also included in this auto-da-fe. Altogether their number amounted to 320 odd, or 360, 2245.

² The cruel manner in which they were executed is described fully Tab., ib.; IA, ib.

³ For a detailed story of Abū Ṭāhir Sulaimān ibn Abū Sa'īd al-Ḥasan ibn Baḥrām al-Jamānī, see de Goeje, 73—143.

⁴ De Goeje, 79.

⁵ A freedman of Muṭṭih (a favorite of Muṭṭah, cf. ibn Miskawaini, Eclipse of the Abbasids, index, s. v.) and governor of al-Basra. The incident of his death is described I, c., I, 105 and IV, (Engl. transl. 116—17). The correct pronunciation of the governor's name is not established. Carra de Vaux in his translation of Mas'ūdī's Tanbih, reads Subuk (the original has no vowel). Similarly the father of Maḥmūd of Ghazna is called Subuktekin. (see Barthold's article on Maḥmūd, Et. III, s. v.).

⁶ With Goldziher and probably MS. Ed. الملك. Cf. de Goeje, 84—86.

⁷ De Goeje, 86.

⁸ Abū-l-Ḳāsim Yūsuf ibn Diwādā ibn alī Sāy, born about 250 A. H., was called by the vizier al-Khasībī to conduct the war against Abū Ṭāhir. He had been governor of Azerbaijan. For his early relations with the Abbāsids see Harold Bowen, Alī ibn Isā, 154—156. His general attitude and his more than suspicious behavior in preparation for the war with Abū Ṭāhir are described by de Goeje, 88—95, esp. 91 ff. (cf. Bowen, l. c., 263). See also Maḳrīzī (Fagan), 82, on the homage paid by him to 'Ubadallah. He was killed by the Karmajian leader in 315 A. H. See Zambaur, 179, note 3.

Mecca and smote whomever he found performing the *Tawāf*¹. It is reported that he put three thousand to death, led away seven hundred maidens, abducted the Black Stone and carried it to al-Bahrain². It was returned thence³ to Kūfa and later sent back from al-Kūfa to Mecca with Abu Ishāq Ibrāhīm ibn Muḥammad ibn Yahya al-Muzakkī [the sheikh⁴ of Nishāpūr⁵ in the year three hundred and twenty nine⁶. Sulaimān ibn al-Ḥasan marched against Baghdād in the year three hundred and eighteen⁷, but when he reached Hīt⁸ a woman hurled a brick at him from her roof and killed him⁹. Then the power of the Karmatians was ¹ See the detailed report about the ravaging of Mecca in de Goeje, 100—111. It goes without saying that the event aroused hot blood in all the Arab historians, very obviously manifested in their accounts of it which abound in maledictions and bristle with passionate hatred.

² The abduction of the Black Stone aroused the anger of even the Fātimids. But de Goeje, 83, argues with good reason that it was only feigned anger, and that, in all probability the act was perpetrated in the first place by order of the Fātimid ruler.

³ MS. ٤٠٠٠; Ed. ٤٠٠٠.

⁴ This phrase is supplied from Sam'ānī, f. 526 b.

⁵ A well known Rawī, died 362 A. H. Najm, II, 439; Yakūt I, 465. See esp. Sam'ānī f. 526 a—b. None of the authorities consulted mentions this traditionist in connection with the restoration of the Black Stone to Mecca, all of them attributing it to Sanbar (e. g. de Goeje, 145). He may perhaps have been merely an adviser in the matter. At any rate we can hardly reject the statement of Baghdādī who was born shortly after that event.

⁶ According to de Goeje, 145, and other sources, this event took place in 339, by order of the Fātimid Khalīf al-Manṣūr. On page 146, note 1, he quotes Hamza Isṣahānī in support of our author's date, but rejects that statement.

⁷ Bagdad was threatened by him in 315 A. H. before his pillage of Mecca. Mas'ūdī Ta'rib (tr. de Vaux), 469, de Goeje 97. Bowen, 268 ff. The attack on Hīt also occurred in 315. Miskawaih, IV, 198 ff., Mas'ūdī, I, c., 490. The confusion in our book may be due to the second capture of Kūfa in 319, (de Goeje, 113), since it was the capture of Kūfa which in 315 had preceded his threat to Bagdad.

⁸ From this statement one would be inclined to believe that he never reached Bagdad having been killed at Hīt before that. As a matter of fact he made his attack on Hīt after Bagdad. (see note above).

⁹ The grounds for this unsubstantiated story of Abu Tāhīr's death which really happened in 332 is the defeat suffered by him at Hīt, as related by Mas'ūdī, who was an eye-witness, I, c., 488.

broken. Following the death of Sulaimān ibn al-Ḥasan, they extorted money from the pilgrims travelling to Mecca from al-Kūfa and al-Basra¹ by collecting escorts² fee³ and guaranteed tribute⁴, until al-Aṣfar al-'Ukailī⁵ captured one of their towns. The control of Egypt and its affairs had fallen into the hands of the Ikshīdiyya⁶. Some of them joined the son of 'Ubadallah al-Bāṭini⁷ who already held sway over Karmān and penetrated into Egypt in the year three hundred and sixty three⁸. They built there a city which they named Cairo⁹, and which the adherents to his heresy inhabit. But the population of Egypt clings firmly to the orthodox faith unto the present day¹⁰, although they demonstrate their loyalty to the governor of Cairo by remitting to him the tax levied upon them.

¹ This refers to the treaty which the Karmatians concluded with the 'Abbasids in 327 A. H. the terms of which guaranteed to them a fixed tribute and toll fee for escorting the pilgrims. De Goeje, 140 ff.

² With MS. ٣٠٤٠٠. Ed. ٣٠٤٠٠.

³ Arabic ٤٠٠٠٠.

⁴ With MS; Ed. ٤٠٠٠. See on him de Sacy, Introd. 223, de Goeje, 193, IA, IX, 40. Cf. also Kay's remarks on the 'Ukailī tribute in JRAAS, 1886, pp. 504—05. He was prompted by selfish motives in his defeat of the Karmatians and not by piety, for he himself now collected the tribute which had previously fallen into the pockets of the heretics. (and let it be remembered that the Banu 'Ukail had themselves been adherents of the Karmatian heresy). Indeed, IA, IX, 221, in recording his death, characterizes him as the one ٤٠٠٠٠ ٤٠٠٠٠ (who used to heavily tax the pilgrims on their journeys). The town he conquered was al-Kāṭif.

⁵ Ed. MS. ٤٠٠٠٠. A family which ruled Egypt (nominally in the name of the 'Abbasid Khalīf) from 323 to 338 A. H. Ikshīdī is a title and goes back to Farḡāna in Persia where their forefathers were said to have been rulers (EI, II, 458). See also Lane-Poole, Hist. of Egypt, 101—2.

⁶ The son, or rather, the grandson of 'Ubadallah is Abu Tamīm Ma'add al-Mu'izz, fourth Fātimid Khalīf, who ruled 341 to 365 A. H. See Wüstenfeld, I, c. (1881) 3—37.

⁷ Egypt was conquered by the Fātimids in 358 A. H. Wüstenfeld, I, c. 7—13; IA, VIII, 435. The date in our text probably refers to Mu'izz's arrival in Egypt in 362. IA, 457, Najm, II, 436.

⁸ See on the name Makrīzī, I, 377. The building of the city was commenced in 356 and completed in 363. It was named after Mars which was then in the ascendant and called ٤٠٠٠. See also Lane-Poole, I, c., 103.

⁹ This fact, besides demonstrating the steadfastness of the Sunnites during that period, testifies equally to the spirit of tolerance which generally distinguished the Fātimids. See Gold-

Abu Shujā' Fanākhusrāw¹ ibn Buweih had made preparations to march² against Egypt and wrench³ it from the hand of the Bāṭiniyya⁴. He enjoined his chiefs in al-Sawād in writing: In the name of Allah the Merciful, the Compassionate. Praised be Allah, Lord of the universe and may the Lord pray for Muhammad, Seal of the Prophets, Obedient to God, Prince of the Faithful. Enter Egypt safely, God willing. He then composed a Kasida, the beginning of which is:

Do you not see the fates obeying me
And clearly communicating to me as though it were ascertained information?
And mankind bears witness to me that I am
The one who is hoped for, and the one who is expected
To aid Islam, and the summoner to
The Khalīf of Allah, the Glorious Imām⁵.

ziber, Streitschrift (Introd.), 7 and note 4: Fihrist, 189; and Gotheil, ZA, XXVI (1911), 203.

¹ Generally called 'Aḡud-al-Dawla (the support of the government), a title conferred on him in 351 A. H. by the nominal ruler, the Khalīf Mu'īf in accordance with a custom introduced at the time of the capture of Bagdad by the Buwāhids in 334 A. H. Fanākhusrāw ruled over 'Irāk and almost the entire extent of Asiatic Islām from 367 to 373 A. H., and, before that, since 335 over other parts of the Persian Empire. Müller, L. c. II, 43 ff.

² MS. wrongly. عزل or عزل; Ed: عزل.

³ MS. wrongly. عزل; Ed: عزل.

⁴ The only reference I find to this planned attack is Wustenfeld, Fatimidien, (1881), 47—48, who relates that 'Aḡud-al-Dawla must have been angered by the theft of a lion from the entrance to his palace, perpetrated by order of the Fatimid al-'Azīz, but he "war indess damals schon zu kränklich... als er sich ernstlich darum hätte bekümmern können" (45). Perhaps the story finds its origin in 'Aḡud-al-Dawla's demand of al-'Azīz that he produce his genealogy in order to confirm his claim of relationship to Muḥammad ibn Ismā'īl. Still another conjecture is that our author developed this tale on the basis of an encounter between the Turkish general, al-Aḡrak and al-'Azīz in 365 A. H. during which the general was urged by the Fatimid Khalīf to recognize his sovereignty (IA, VII, 483—87). Ikhtāl, II, 483, adds that Aḡrak turned to the Buwāhid ruler for help. Cf. Wustenfeld, L. c., 40—46.

⁵ In view of the fact that the Buwāhids were of Shi'ite confession, it is likely that the allusion is to the twelfth Imām, particularly since the Sunni Khalīf would hardly be called al-Imām al-muḥfakkar. This in no way conflicts with Fanākhusrāw's allegiance to the 'Abbāsids. Nor should we wonder at the readiness with which Baghdādī cites the sectarian poem. We have already seen that he utilizes Imāmīte sources. See above, 102 n. 1. Indeed, the entire story of the campaign may be of Imāmīte origin.

When his warriors went forth with the purpose of proceeding to Egypt, death claimed him and he went the way of all flesh. After Fanākhusrāw departed this life, the chief of Egypt cast a covetous glance upon the kingdoms of the Eastern provinces. He communicated with them, exhorting them to pledge allegiance to him. Kābis¹ ibn Washukīr made the following reply to his letter: I shall not mention you save in repose. Nāṣir al-Dawla abu-l-Ḥasan Muḥammad ibn Ibrahim ibn Sīmūr² gave his answer by writing on the back of his letter to him: O, you infidel! I shall not worship that which you worship³, down to the end of the Surā. Nūḥ⁴ ibn Mansūr, governor of Khurāsān, answered by killing the missionaries of his heresy. One of the rulers of al-Jurjān in the land of Khwarezm responded to his call. His conversion to his religion became for him a cause of adversity in that his kingdom vanished and his men were annihilated⁵. Later Yamin al-Dawla and Amin al-Milla Maḥmūd ibn Subuktekin became master of their land and killed all of the Bāṭinitic propagandists who were active there. Abu 'Alī ibn Sīmūr⁶ sympathized secretly with their views, so he attempted rebellion⁷, but his efforts in this undertaking miscarried. Nūḥ ibn Mansūr, ¹ With the surname Shams-al-Ma'ālī, of the Zīyārī dynasty; ruled over Jurjān and Tabaristān from 366 to 403 A. H., except for a period of 17 years (371—388) on account of a revolution during which his son reigned in his place. Ikhtāl, II, pp. 507—10; Ibn Isṭadyar, Hist. of Tabaristān, (tr. Browne), 225—233. Yaḳūt who gives a full biography of him in Iṣṭahād, VI, 6, 143—152, mentions nothing about his correspondence with the Fatimids Ed. has عز, as his father's name. Ms. correctly عز.

² Commander of the armies in Khurāsān; removed in 371, (IA, IX, 7), but reinstated in 372, ib., 17—18.

³ Surā 109, vv. 1—2.

⁴ Surnamed al-Rīdā; one of the Samanid rulers, 366—387 A. H.

⁵ I have not been able to discover whom our author refers to. It may possibly be one of the Zīyārī rulers who held sway over Jurjān, although they were nominally dependent on the Samanids and later the Ghaznavids, Hartmann, EF, I, 1065. Or perhaps it is one of the rebels whom Kābis finally crushed.

⁶ The full account of Abu 'Alī's activity and struggle with Nūḥ are recorded in 'Urbi, L. c., pp. 108—178. Also Ḳazwīnī, Tarikh Guzida (tr. Gantū) I, 43—53.

⁷ None of the sources dealing with the rebellion of Abu 'Alī mentions his Bāṭinitic sympathies. But it should be remembered that Baghdādī, who lived in Nisāpūr, Nūḥ's center

277 governor of Khurāsān, seized him and sent him to Subutekin; he was executed in the province of Ghazna.¹

Abu-l-Kāsim al-Ḥasan ibn 'Alī², surnamed Dazsamand³, became the missionary of the Bāṭiniyya doctrine by appointment of Abu 'Alī ibn Sīmjur, but Bakūzūn⁴, commander of a Samanid army, overcame him in Nishāpūr and killed him⁵. He was buried in an unknown place. Amīrak al-Jūsī, governor of the district Tharwaih⁶ had joined the mission of the Bāṭiniyya. He was taken captive, carried to Ghazna and killed there on the same night as Abu 'Alī ibn Sīmjur⁷. The inhabitants of Multān in the land of India, had enrolled in the movement of the Bāṭiniyya. Maḥmūd set out against them with his army, killed thousands of them⁸, and chopped off the arms of thousands of them. Thus the successes⁹ of the Bāṭiniyya vanished from their midst. In this we find clear proof of the ill-fortune which the rite of the Bāṭiniyya brings upon its imitators; let those who will take heed.

The theologians differ in their opinions regarding the ultimate aim sought by the Bāṭiniyya in the missionary activity in behalf of their heresy. Most of them lean to the view that the object of the Bāṭiniyya was to convert [the Muslims] to the religion of the Magians with the aid of the method of allegorization of activities, for a number of years, may have collected some unrecorded data which circulated among the inhabitants of that city.

¹ According to Kazwini, l. c., 53, and 'Utbi, l. c., Abu 'Alī was killed by order of Nūh, either while being sent to his protector, al-Ma'mun (Kazwini) or in prison ('Utbi). l. c., however, agrees with Baghdādī's report, except that according to him he died in prison instead of being executed. IX, 76.

² The brother of Abu 'Alī who took up the latter's efforts after his death. For his history see 'Utbi, l. c., 189—95, 218—24. His fall came in 388 A. H.

³ Casanova's correction; Ed. and MS. دازسماند.

⁴ Ed. بکوزون, MS. بکوزون. He was the general of the army under Maṣṣūr, successor to Nūh. 'Utbi, l. c., 206, calls him Lord Chamberlain. Cf. l. c., IX, 91.

⁵ According to Kazwini, Tarīkh Gazīda (tr. Gauthi) I, 59—61, he met his final defeat at the hands of Naṣr ibn Subutekin, Maḥmūd's brother.

⁶ I have not been able to identify this name.

⁷ 'Utbi, l. c., 196.

⁸ l. c., 326—329.

⁹ With MS. الغنى; Ed. الغنى.

by which they interpret the Qur'ān and the Sunna. In proof of this they cite the charge that their founder Ma'mūn ibn Daīsān was a Magian taken captive(?) at al-Ahwāz. His son, 'Abdallāh ibn Ma'mūn¹ invited people to adhere to the religion of his father. They find further support in the fact that their missionary, al-Baḏaḥī² by name, states in his book entitled al-Maḥṣūl (Sum and Substance) that the first Author originated the Soul (al-Nafs). Since then the First and Second regulate the world by regulating the seven stars and the four elements³. This indeed is the essence of the teachings of the Magians, that al-Yazdān created Ahriman, and that He together with Ahriman manage the universe, except that al-Yazdān is the author of good deeds and Ahriman the author of evil. Others have linked the Bāṭiniyya to the Ṣābiāns who live in Ḥarrān. They also find confirmation of their view in this, that the Ṣābiāns keep their doctrines secret⁴, and reveal them only to their adherents. Like them, the Bāṭiniyya do not reveal their doctrines save to one who becomes one of them after they administer⁵ an oath to him that he will not relate their mysteries to any one outside their group. 'Abd-al-Kāhīr says: The most plausible explanation to my mind is that they are Zerdik Materialists who profess a belief in the eternity of the universe, and disacknowledge the apostles and all the precepts of the Law, because they are disposed to permit everything to which one's natural desires incline⁶. Proof that they are as we have described them will be forthcoming from what I have read in an Epistle of theirs entitled: Conduct, the Most Exalted Communication.

¹ With the exception of a historically correct statement Ed. 16, (Seeley, 35), this is the only time that our author mentions 'Abdallāh, the man who played a far greater role in the organization of the Bāṭiniyya than his frequently cited father. In Usul, 329, he gives the same information as in the citations above.

² Abu 'Abdallāh Muḥammad ibn Aḥmad al-Nasafī mentioned above, 113, and called there Bandāna. Masségnon, Bibliogr. Quarante, 332, calls him Baradha'i making him a native of Baradha'a, a town on the borders of Azerbaijan (Yāqūt, s. v.).

³ See above, 115-7, and notes.

⁴ Chwolson, Die Ssabier, 161.

⁵ MS. has the unused VIII. form: مأخذ.

⁶ The same accusation is hurled against them by Nowairi in de Sacy, Introd. 127. Cf. also Streitschrift, Introd., 38.

⁷ With MS. الغنى; Ed. الغنى.

tion, and the Most Authoritative Law. It is a writing sent by 'Ubadallah ibn al-Ḥasan al-Kairuānī¹ to Sulaimān ibn al-Ḥasan Abū Sa'īd al-Jannābī in which he enjoins him as follows: Carry on your activity among the people by ingratiating yourself with them by way of showing sympathy with whatever they are inclined to, and put the false idea into the heads of all of them that you are one of them. Any one of whose sincerity you are satisfied, — draw the veil aside for him. If you gain influence over a philosopher, hold on to him, for in the philosophers our trust resides. We and they are agreed² with respect to the law-books of the prophets, and the belief in the eternity of the world. Only³ some of them differ with us, believing that the world has a governing agent whom they do not acknowledge. He treats in this letter of the denial of the belief in the world-to-come and in retribution, and he declares in it that Paradise consists of the pleasures enjoyed in this world, and that torture is simply the engagement of observers of the Law in prayer, fasting, pilgrimages and holy wars.⁴ He also states in that epistle: Verily, the followers of the Revealed Law worship a God whom they do not know and whom they attain only in name, not in substance. Further on he writes: The most renowned materialists are of the same cast as we, and we as they.⁵

Herein we find proof of the relation between the Bāṭiniyya and the Materialists. What lends greater strength to this view is that the Magians profess the prophetic character of Zardusht and the descent of a revelation to him from

¹ Maassigmon who characterizes the following epistle as being "d'un cynisme rare" apparently doubts its authenticity, l. c., 332. It is, judging from the similarity to the extracts found in de Sacy, Introd. 148 ff., the same letter as the one called ٢٠٠ by Nowairi.

² Casanova's correction, contra "in" of Ed. and MS.

³ I omit the word ٥', since our text seems to follow almost verbatim the paragraph on p. 152 of de Sacy's Introd., so far as can be gathered from the translation.

⁴ Reading with MS. ٧٢; Ed. ٧٢.

⁵ For a more objective statement of the Bāṭiniyya views on Paradise and Hell see Guyard, 191.

⁶ It is in itself very doubtful whether the adherents of the Bāṭiniyya movement would readily identify their views with any existing. That it accommodated itself to any and every creed is true only of its preliminary stages.

God. The Ṣābiāns claim prophecy for Hermes¹, Wāḥ², Dūr³, Tayūs⁴, Allāṭūn and a number of philosophers. The believers in a Revealed Law, all communities alike, affirm the descent of a revelation from heaven upon those, respectively, whose prophetic character they maintain, and they assert that that revelation comprises commands and prohibitions and information regarding life after death, reward and punishment, and paradise and hell, in which retribution will be received for⁵ past deeds⁶. The Bāṭiniyya, however, reject miracles, disavow the appearance of angels from heaven with a revelation and with commands and prohibitions; nay, they deny that there is an angel to be found in heaven. Instead, they explain angels allegorically as the missionaries for their innovation; they interpret the Ṣatāns to be their antagonists, and the Ibīṣes⁷, the learned among their antagonists⁸. They contend that the prophets are men who aspire to supremacy, and that they govern the general public by laws and artifice, seeking lordship by claiming for themselves prophecy and the Imāmate⁹.

¹ The list in Abūṭrānī, 187, differs quite substantially from ours, mentioning of those in our text only Hermes and Wāḥ. Hermes whom Abūṭrānī, 198, identifies with Idri's, the Arabic for Enoch (but see Noeldke, Z. A. XVII, 83-4) is merely a means on the part of the Ṣābiāns to claim a prophet whom the Muḥammadans will recognize. Chwolson l. c., I, 627-37, and for a characterization of both Hermes and Idri's, 783-92.

² He may perhaps be ٢٠٧٢ mentioned by al-Khifī as quoted by Asin Palacios, Alen-hazam, II, 235, note 120. Chwolson, l. c., 800, pretends the reading ٢٠٧٢ in Ibn Ḥazm's text and identifies him with Hellen.

³ I have not been able to identify him.

⁴ He is probably Tātūs (Tat), son of Hermes, a Syro-Egyptian God, inventor of writing, ib. 794-5.

⁵ With MS. ٧٢; Ed. ٧٢.

⁶ These to a Muslim are the pre-requisites for any religion before it is tolerated. Chwolson, l. c., 627 ff.

⁷ From this statement it appears that Ibīṣ is a higher type of demonic spirit than the Ṣatāns. While Wensinck and Gauderoy-Demombynes (El, s. v. Ibīṣ and Ṣaṭīṭān, respectively) and the latter also in ERE, s. v. Demons and Spirits in Islam, all testify that the Ṣatāns are sometimes identifiable with Jin, and G.-D. also states that al-Shaṭān or Ibīṣ is their head, it is a little astonishing to find our author talking of a number of Ibīṣes.

⁸ With MS. ٢٢٤٢٤; Ed. ٢٢٤٢٤. The same expressions are employed Usūl, 330. Streitschrift, Introd., 38.

Each one¹ of them is the master² of a sevenfold cycle³. When the seven in their cycle¹ are terminated they are followed by another cycle⁴. When they speak of the prophet and his heir⁵ they declare: Verily, the prophet is the Nāṭiq (speaker) and the heir, his Asās, is the *Ḥāṭiq*⁶ (possessor of command). On this Faṭḥ devotes the task of interpreting esoterically the speech of the *Nāṭiq*⁷ in

¹ The following, which sounds like an exposition of the views of the Bāṭiniyya on the prophetic cycles, is hardly in place here among Baghdādī's deprecatory arguments.

² The Ḥāṭiq is also known as the Ṣāḥib al-Ḥayāt or Ṣāḥib al-Ḥayāt. For the Karāmīans, Muḥammad ibn Ismaʿīl is the master of the cycle since it is his teachings that hold sway at present, de Sacy, Introd., 108, and n. 2. For other sectarians, e. g. the Druzes, Nusairīs, etc., the incumbent is another person.

³ The wide extent to which they utilize the numeral seven which has given them the name Sabʿiyya (Streitschrift, Introd., 37, n. 7; ib., 348) is well illustrated in Samʿānī, I, 229 b. Although the group under discussion there is not excluded from Islam by the Sunnites since they recognize Mīsa al-Kāhīm as the seventh Imam, there can be no doubt that many of the seven-groups listed there were adopted by the Bāṭiniyya.

⁴ With MS. عنه: Ed. omits عنه.

⁵ The meaning behind this laconic statement is as follows: Since the world consists of a series of emanations, each less perfect than its progenitor, there is a constant urge to attain the perfection of the Universal Intellect. This urge is already shared by the Universal Soul. But in her effort the Soul must be aided by an agent sent by Reason which is the Active Intellect. But the Reason and the Soul, in order to guide the world to salvation, must be incarnated in two beings, the Nāṭiq and his Asās. However, since man is mortal, the incarnation, although always the same, is externally different, being represented by seven Nāṭiqs and, between each pair, by seven Imāms who carry on while the Law of the Nāṭiq is diffused, and the world is being prepared for the next speaker Guyard, 187—9; de Goeje, 166 f., Shahr, 148, (Haarbrucker, 222—3).

⁶ Reading with MS. عنه: Ed. عنه. The theory of the prophet and his heir is not altogether foreign to Shiʿite circles. Even the more moderate Imāniyya consider the Imāms to be the heirs of the prophets and destined to maintain God's proof on earth. See Ibn Babūyeh, Zur Mahdi-Lehre des Ismailis, Ed. Ernst Moeller, 24.

⁷ Baghdādī is, to my knowledge, the only authority who employs this term for the Asās. The first of the seven who form the cycle of a Nāṭiq and who are called Ṣāmiṣ (Silent). The seven Nāṭiqs are Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, Muḥammad and Muḥammad ibn Ismaʿīl. The seven Asās are Seth, Sem, Ishmael, Aaron, Peter, Ali and ʿAbdallāh ibn al-Kaḍāḥ. See e. g. Guyard, 291. There was still another scheme of twelve Nāṭiqs (heads) comparable to the twelve signs of the Zodiac, ib., 306 & 321, n. 20.

⁸ It is the duty of the Asās to promulgate the Law newly revealed by the Speaker, and accordance with the way he sees his desire tending. Whoever is converted to his esoteric interpretation is one of the pure angels¹, but he who acts in accordance with the exoteric sense is one of the unbelieving Satans. Furthermore, they allegorize every fundamental of the revealed law in such wise as will entail heresy². They maintain that the meaning of prayer is the patronage of their Imām, and that the pilgrimage is the visit to him and perseverance in his service³. By fasting the abstention from revealing the secret of the Imām is intended, and not abstinence from food. Harlotry according to them is the divulgence of their secrets contrary to the covenant and bond⁴. They hold that whoever knows the meaning of worship is thereby freed of the duty of performing it. They interpreted in this sense His words: "Serve your Lord until you attain absolute certainty"⁵. They stretched the words "absolute certainty" to mean knowledge of the esoteric.

In fact, Al-Kāfirānī states in his epistle to Sulaimān ibn al-Ḥasan: Behold, I enjoin you to instil doubt into peoples' hearts regarding the Kurʾān, the Torah, the Psalms and the Gospels, and to urge them to relinquish the precepts⁶ of the Law, to reject the dogmas of an after-life and resurrection⁷, to reject the belief in angels in heaven, and to reject the belief in Jin on earth. I bid you further to urge them to accept the view that a multitude of people existed before Adam; this will be of assistance to you in teaching the pre-existence of the world. In in this sense he is the possessor of it. Perhaps we could also interpret the word (Faṭḥ) in its meaning of slitter, since he cuts open the secret, that is, he expounds the inner meaning of the Nāṭiq's words. Guyard, 303 and 319, n. 5.

¹ The proof is apparently in the story of God's command to the angels to bow before Adam, the first Nāṭiq, and the curse pronounced on Satan, Sura 38, vv. 71—6. Cf. Guyard, 288—9 and 299 n. 26.

² The importance of the Imām grows in the system of the Bāṭiniyya as time passes. See Ivanow, Ismailiyya, Passim. It is with this later view that Ghazālī has his main quarrel in the Streitschrift, e. g. "The Sharīʿa of the Prophet" is a veil of the Imām (p. 26).

³ The great stress laid on keeping the secret is emphasized in the severe oath administered to the novitiate, see below.

⁴ Sura 15, v. 99.

⁵ Streitschrift, Introd., 38, lines 13—14.

⁶ ib., line 21, Cf. also ib., 46, last line 1.

281 this we find a corroboration of our claim that the Bāṭiniyya are materialists who teach the eternity of the world and disacknowledge the Maker¹. What substantiates our charge that they favor the abrogation of the Law is that al-Kairūnī also writes in his letter to Sulaimān ibn al-Ḥasan: It is urgent that you thoroughly comprehend the tricks and contradictions of the prophets in their various declarations. For example, 'Isā son of Mariam said to the Jews: I shall not abolish the law of Moses². Then he abolished it by consecrating Sunday in place of the Sabbath. And he permitted work on the Sabbath, and he reversed the Kibla of Moses in the opposite direction. For this reason the Jews³ killed him, as his words were contradictory.

Then he writes to him: Do not be like the chief of the down-trodden nation⁴, who, when asked regarding the spirit, replied: "The spirit comes by the command of my Lord⁵," because the answer to the question did not occur to him. Be not like Moses in his claim for which he had no evidence save lying supported by the most magnificent artifices and juggling. As the Law-giver in his time [Pharaoh] did not find any testimony to confirm his claim, he said to him: "Verily thou shalt not take to thyself a God other than me⁶. He [Pharaoh] said to his people: "I am your most exalted Lord⁷," because he was the master of the time in his cycle⁸. At the end of his letter he declares: There is no wonder so great as the wonder over a person who pretends to be intelligent, yet, if he has a beautiful sister or daughter, does not make one of them his wife by virtue of her beauty, but declares her unlawful to himself and marries her to an outsider.

¹ Ib., 38, line 20.

² Matthew, 5, 18; Luke, 16, 17.

³ Reading with MS. وأنه; Ed. أنه.

⁴ An epithet for the Arabs well in line with the Persian origin of the movement. (Cf. Goldziher's article on the Shu'ūbiyya Maḥ. St. Vol. I). It is an even more appropriate term from the pen of one who regarded Islām as a means for enslaving the people to the advantage of a few. If the epistle is a pure invention, the choice of the adjective is nevertheless a happy one.

⁵ Sura 17, 87. Orthodox Islām also regards this reply as a confession of ignorance.

See Baiḍ. ad loc.

⁶ Sura 26, v. 28. ⁷ Sura 79, v. 24.

⁸ MS. دوره for دوره. Isf. reads here: وانما ساء الاطى قال انا ربكم الحق في زواجه في دوره وملك الحق في زواجه قال انا ربكم الاطى وانما ساء الاطى كان صاحب زواجه في دوره.

But if the stupid one possessed sense he would understand that he has better title to his sister or his daughter than the stranger. The true aspect of this is simply that their master¹ forbade to them the enjoyment of the good and inspired into their hearts fear of a Hidden Being who cannot be apprehended. This is the God in whose existence they believe. He related traditions to them about the existence of what they will never witness, such as resurrection from the graves, retribution, paradise and hell. Thus he soon subjugated them and reduced them to slavery to himself during his lifetime, and to his offspring after his death. In this way he arrogated to himself the right to enjoy their wealth, for he says: "I ask you no reward for it except friendliness to my relatives²." His dealings with them were on a cash basis, but their dealings with him were on credit. He required of them an immediate exchange of their lives and property for a future promise which would never be realized. Is Paradise aught³ save this world and its enjoyment? Or are hell and its torture anything but the state to which the observers of the Law are reduced, namely: weariness and exertion in prayer, fasting, the holy war and the pilgrimage?

Finally he declares to Sulaimān ibn al-Ḥasan in this epistle: You and your brethren are the heirs who will inherit Firdaus⁴, and in this world you have acquired its pleasures and luxuries which are forbidden to the ignorant, those held in check by the precepts of the law-givers. Congratulations to you upon the freedom from their power which you have attained. — In what we have related

¹ i. e. Muḥammad.

² Sura 42, 23. There is no distortion of meaning in this verse on the part of the Bāṭiniyya. Despite the contentions of the modern Arab translators of the Qur'ān, Manṭiq Muḥammad 'Alī and Ḥafiz Ghulam Sarwar, ad loc., the old commentators agree with the interpretation as given here. Baiḍāwī, II, 230, even cites a tradition according to which the relations are 'Alī and Fāṭima and their offspring. Cf. de Sacy, Introd., 203, n. 2. See also Korṣanasi-ḡung., 268-9.

³ Or, there is no paradise etc. See Worrell's article on the Particle و, Z4, XXI (1906), 116—150, especially 131—2 and 149.

⁴ Whether the alleged author of this letter meant by Firdaus anything other than paradise (which is the meaning given to it by Muḥammad, E. I., s. v. Firdaus), it is difficult to say. Among the orthodox the word assumes a more specialized sense, referring to certain portions of Paradise, ib.

one finds evidence that the goal of the Bāṭiniyya is to teach the doctrine of the Materialists, to allow the things which are forbidden, and to relinquish works.

In luring the dull-heads and converting them to their heresy, the Bāṭiniyya avail themselves of strategic devices according to Degrees which they name:¹ Perception, Familiarization, Instilling doubt, Leaving in Suspense, Intoxication,² Concealing, Laying the Foundation, Sealing the Bond by Oath and Covenant, and finally, Ungodliness and Renunciation.

Concerning Tafarrus (Perception). - They say: It is a pre-requisite for a missionary of their heresy that he be skilful in dissembling and well-versed in the methods of interpreting the esoteric so as to give it an esoteric meaning. He must at the same time distinguish³ between one whose conquest and seduction may⁴ be attempted and one who offers no prospect. With this in mind, they make the following recommendations to their missionaries: Hold no discussions in a house where there is a light, meaning by the light one who knows dogmatic theology and the various ways of speculation and analogy. They further instruct their missionaries: Do not cast your seed into saline soil. They understand by this the abstention of their missionaries from disclosing their heresy to people upon whom their evil teachings will produce no effect, just as seed in saline ground will produce nothing. They ¹ His list Mawāḍiʿ, (350-51) is quite the same as ours except that the first degree is called al-ḥal, and the eighth, instead of the covenant, is al-ʿahd which our author joins with al-ḥal as the last. Chazali agrees with Jh. cf. Streitschrift, Introd., 40-42. Indeed, as will be pointed out later, the oath and covenant which should be discussed as the fifth degree under Rabi is detached from its context and given later as a separate stage (Ed. 287, ff.), thus leaving Rabi an empty term and forcing our author to identify it with Taʿlīf. De Sacy who devotes pages 75-147 of his Introd. to the degrees and the oath differs almost completely from the other authorities in his discussion. While he also counts nine stages, he seems to crowd into the first all that the others spread over the first six, cf. 74-96, especially 94 f. His remaining eight degrees deal actually with a gradual initiation into the inner secrets of the movement. Although the consensus among the three authorities seems to confirm the exposition, it cannot be denied that de Sacy's system is more logical. Makrizi's version, which de Sacy utilized, will be found in the Khitaṭ, I, 291-95.

² See below.

³ Reading ṣayyā with Ms.; Ed. ṣayyā.

⁴ Reading with Ms. ṣayyā; Ed. ṣayyā.

call the hearts of their stupid followers fertile soil, because they are susceptible to their doctrine. But this comparison ought rather to be reversed, since the fertile hearts are those which receive the orthodox religion and walk in the righteous path. They are the ones who do not swerve after the fashion of the blundering people, like pure gold which does not become rusty in water, is not consumed by the earth, and is not diminished by fire. The saline soil is like the hearts of the Bāṭiniyya and the other godless people whom sound sense does not deter, nor do laws restrain. They are the foul and the impure, the dead, not the living.¹ "They² are nothing but as cattle, nay, they are furthest astray from the path", and the most easily deceived. He who has provided sustenance for swine in their pastures and provided food for lizards³ in their wasteland has apportioned to them their share of sustenance. "He cannot be questioned concerning what He does, and they shall be questioned⁴."

They direct further: It is required of the missionary that he be acquainted with the various methods by which parties can be swayed. For the conversion of the groups is not along one line; nay, every group of people provides its own starting point from which it is to be invited to the doctrine of the Bāṭiniyya. If⁵ it is one whom the propagandist sees inclining to acts of worship, he urges him to devote himself to ascetic practices and good works. Then he inquires of him about the meaning of works and the underlying causes of the precepts, and he throws him into doubt with respect to them. Whomever he finds to be impudent and dissolute he tells: Religious acts are foolish and stupid, whereas intelligence manifests itself in the quest for pleasure. He expresses his thoughts to him in the words of the poet⁶:

¹ An allusion to Sura 16, verses 20, 21.

² Sura 25, v. 44.

³ Reading with Ms. ṣayyā; Ed. ṣayyā.

⁴ Sura 21, v. 23.

⁵ The various methods of approach, including those to Jews and Christians are related much more fully in de Sacy, Introd., 148 ff. They probably draw from one source.

⁶ The following couplet is from the pen of Salm al-Khāṣir (see his biography) Aghāni, xxi, 110ff. The anecdote about the line, which also involves his teacher Basīshār b. Burd is related ib., 112-13 and op. cit., III, 49.

He who is mindful of people dies of solicitude,
But the bold man acquires pleasure.

When he sees one in a troubled state regarding his religion or regarding after-life, reward or punishment, he speaks to him openly about discarding them, and urges him to enjoy the things which are forbidden, and comforts both him and himself with the words of the shameless poet:¹

Shall I renounce the joys of the red wine

Because of the meat and wine which they promise?

Life, then death, then resurrection, —

Fictitious tales, O mother of 'Amr.

If it is one whom he identifies as a member of the Ghulāt among the Rawāfiḍ, such as the Sabbābiyya or the Muḡniyya or the Mansūriyya, or the Khaṭiābiyya, he does not need² in that case to interpret the verses of the Kurān or the traditions, because all of them alike render them allegorically in harmony with their blunders. When he sees one of the Rawāfiḍ, either Zaidite³ or Imāmīte, disposed to challenge the traditions about the Companions, he makes his overtures to him by way of reviling the Companions, and elaborates on the hatred for the Banu Teim because Abu Bekr belonged to their tribe, and the hatred for the Banu 'Adi because 'Omar ibn al-Khaṭiāb was a member of their tribe. He exhorts him to hate the Banu 'Umayya because 'Uthmān and Mu'āwīa came from them. Generally the Bāṭini of our age finds support in the words of Isma'īl ibn 'Abbad:⁴

To be condemned to hell because of affection for the rightful heir

And because of preferring the family of the Prophet

Is more attractive to me than the Garden of Eden

Where I would dwell eternally by recognizing Teim or 'Adi.⁴

285

¹ Ms. ٤٣٤. 1a See Additional Notes.

² De Sacy, Introḍ., 148 ff.

³ 385—386 A. H. with the honorary title of al-Sāṭib. He was vizier to Mu'ayyid-al-Dawla Abu Mansūr Barwāh ibn Rukn-al-Dawla, and, later, to his brother Fakhr-al-Dawla. He was of Shi'ite persuasion. Yakkū, who gives a long account of him and quotes much of his poetry (Irshād, II, 273—343) does not cite our verses. See on his Shi'ite leanings, I, c, 328 ff.

⁴ The names Teim for Abu Bekr and 'Adi for 'Omar are terms of insult. Goldzher, Spottnamen d. ersten Chalifen bei den Schiiten in WZKM, XV (1901) 326.

'Abd-al-Kāhīr says: We have made a reply to this singer in the following verses:

Do you entertain hopes of entering the Garden of Eden

While you are an enemy of Teim and of 'Adi?

Why, they have left you in a worse plight than Thamūd,

They have left you more disgraced than a bastard son.

Verily, you will some future day roast in hell fire,

Since the Friend of the Prophet¹ regards you as an enemy.

When the missionary discovers one who accepts Abu Bekr and 'Omar he eulogizes them in his presence and says: These two played a role in the interpretation of the Law. For this reason the Prophet sought Abu Bekr as his companion in the cave and later in Medina and communicated to him in the cave the true meaning of his law. When the person who is attached to Abu Bekr and 'Omar questions him regarding this above-mentioned interpretation, he engages him by covenants and bonds to keep secret whatever he reveals to him. Then he relates to him by degrees some of the explanations. If he agrees to them he reveals the remainder to him, but if he does not accept the first interpretation from him, he withholds the remainder and conceals it; but as a result of that the deceived one is thrown into doubt regarding the fundamentals of the Law.

Those among whom the doctrine of the Bāṭiniyya makes progress fall into several divisions. First there is the general public whose comprehension of the essentials of knowledge and speculation is trifling², like the Nabateans³, or the Kurds, or the descendants of the Magians. The second group includes the Shu'ūbiyya⁴ (Persian nationalists) who believe in the superiority of the Persians to the Arabs,

¹ I. e. Abu Bekr, called al-Siddik (the Friend).

² With Ms. ٤٣٥; Ed. ٤٣٥.

³ On the rift between the Nabateans and Arabs see Goldzher, Muk. St. I, 156 ff.

⁴ See Goldzher's masterly study of this group which he characterizes as "ein Kreis von Schriftstellern und Gelehrten, nicht aber von unzufriedenem Volk und aufrichtigem Pöbel" in Muk. St., I, 147 ff. On their utilization by the Bāṭiniyya see ib., 175. Cf. Streitschrift, Introḍ., 42, I, 9. The view was generally prevalent that a gap existed between the Arab and non-Arab elements. See e. g. the account which makes the Fāṭimids descendants of Jews as reported Ia, VIII, 20. See also the conversation as cited from Bayan al-Aḍyan in Blochet, 149. Cf. II, in Shiites I, 35; II, 16.

and are eager for the restoration of the kingdom to the Persians. The third group consists of the senseless among the Banu Rabi'a owing to their jealousy of the Banu Mudar because the Prophet came from them.¹ It is for this reason that 'Abdallah ibn Khazim al-Sulami² said in his inaugural sermon³ in Khurāsān: The Rabi'a have always been embittered against God ever since He raised His Prophet from the Mudar. Because of the envy nurtured by the Rabi'a against the Mudar, the Banu Hanifa invested Musallima⁴ the Liar, hoping that there would be a prophet among the Banu Rabi'a as there had been among the Mudar. When the gullible Persian or the Rabi'ite, envious of the Mudar⁵, becomes more familiarized with the statement⁶ of the Bāṭini: Your people have better title to the government than the Mudar, he inquires of him regarding the occasion when the power will be restored to his people. When he asks him about it he answers him: Verily, ¹ The Mudar and Rabi'a are both sub-divisions of the northern Arabs, known variously as Nizār, Ma'add or Adhān, all three of them ancestors. Besides the general enmity between these latter northern, or Kāis, and the southern or Yemenite tribes (see Goldziher's article Der arabische Stammeswesen und der Islam in Muh. St., I, 40 — 100 and particularly 78 ff.), rivalry also existed between the two sub-divisions of the northern group which may well have had other causes than the jealousy over the Prophet's tribe. As O'Leary says about the "marked rivalry, often leading to warfare, between the Rabi'a and Mudar": "The rivalry of the two may have been developed, if not actually started, by the jealousies bred by the spoil gained by the Muslim armies as they advanced into Asia". Arabia before Mohammed, 19. Indeed, in Basra we find the Rabi'a and the Azd (a southern tribe) making common cause against the Mudar. Wellhausen, Arabisches Reich, 248.

² See Ibn Hajar's Biogr. of Persons who knew Mohammed, ii, No. 9010. He was governor of Khurāsān in 32 A. H. (it was gained dishonestly, I, iii, 106 and more fully 366—7.) and again 64—73, the second time as a rebel against the 'Umayyads. He was killed in battle in 73, I, index, s. v. The statement reported here was not made in his Khutba in Khurāsān, when he eagerly sought to justify himself (I, ii, 367), but at the time of his siege of the Rabi'a tribe in Herat in 64 A. H. I, iv, 130. According to Tab. iii, 1242 these words were spoken by the Khalīf al-Ma'mūn to account for his dislike of the Arabs (cited by Goldziher, I, c. 149).

³ With Ms. ٤٠٤٦; Ed. ٤٠٤٦.

⁴ I, ii, 267. In his defense see Caetani, Annali dell' Islam, II, (Anno 11) par. 168—9.

⁵ Contra Ed. and Ms. ٤٠٤٦, with Brockelmann, I, c., 286.

⁶ With Ms. ٤٠٤٦; Ed. ٤٠٤٦.

the law of Mudar will continue for a fixed limit of time. Its end is drawing nigh and after its termination the government will come back to you. Then he expounds to him the allegorical interpretation of the fundamentals¹ of the Law of Islam step by step. If he accepts this from him, he becomes a godless person and a Khurāmi², finds works burdensome, and derives pleasure from allowing to himself the things which are forbidden. This is an exposition of the degree of Perception among them.

The stage of familiarization is closely related³ to the stage of perception. It consists in extolling to the utmost in the presence of the person that in his doctrine to which he is attached⁴, and in asking him later⁵ on about the interpretation of that to which he adheres and instilling doubt into him about the essentials of his religion. When the novice asks him about that, he says: The knowledge of this rests with the Imām. In this way he attains the degree of Instilling Doubt⁶, when the initiate arrives at the conviction that what is aimed at by the apparent explanation (of the Kur'ān) and the tradition is not their determined meaning in the language. As a result of that it becomes a light matter for him to transgress the prohibitive laws and to relinquish works. The degree of intoxication is with

¹ Ms. ٤٠٤٦; Ed. ٤٠٤٦.

² With Ms. ٤٠٤٦; Ed. ٤٠٤٦. Brockelmann's emendation ("Hideous Infidel"), ib., is obviously unnecessary.

³ With Ms. ٤٠٤٦; Ed. ٤٠٤٦.

⁴ Ghazālī in Streitschrift, Text No. 2 (Arabic part p. 4) describes in detail the way pursued to win his confidence. Evening meetings are arranged in the house of a neophyte where a man with a good voice reads the Kur'ān, discourses and pleasing words are heard, condemnation of present rulers and uninformed scholars is pronounced and blessings promised to the few by the Prophet's Family. All this time the missionary weeps occasionally, utters deep groans, alludes to divine secrets when he hears a verse of the Kur'ān recited or a tradition related, which are revealed only to those whom God has chosen. Late in the night he still keeps awake praying, so that the owner of the house finds him in that state when he wakes. But as soon as he is discovered he sinks away so as to create an impression of his eagerness to hide it. In this way he gains the person's confidence and attracts his attention to all he says. According to 'Ifi, 350, the second stage comprises most of what our author included under the first.

⁵ This part of the sentence is really the third degree as Baghdādī goes right on to say.

A full account of the procedure for instilling doubt will be found below 149 ff. Ed 291, ff.

⁶ With Ms. ٤٠٤٦; Ed. ٤٠٤٦.

them the state of leaving the soul of the novice in suspense in its quest for the true meaning of the fundamentals of the law.¹ Now he either accepts its interpretation from them in such wise as will induce him to discard it [the Law], or he remains in a state of doubt and confusion regarding it. The stage of falsification consists in telling the deceived one who is ignorant of the principles of deductive and inductive reasoning that the exterior meanings are chastisement and the hidden meanings are an act of grace.² He cites to him His words in the Kur'ān: "Then separation would be brought about³ between them, with a wall having a door in it. The inside of it shall be mercy, and the outside of it, before it shall be chastisement". If the deceived one questions them regarding the meaning of the "inside of the door", they say: God's Sunna abounds in cases of the conclusion of covenants and bonds with his apostles. Therefore He says: "And when we made a covenant with the prophets and with you and with Nūh and Ibrahim and Mūsa and 'Isa son of Mariam and we made with them a strong covenant".

¹ Streitschrift, (Text No. 4, p. 5) describes how the missionary is to persist in his refusal to reveal the secrets and in telling him that God's religion is too precious to be disclosed to any but the right people. He even makes a pretense of sending him away. Our author becomes exceedingly vague and confused in the presentation of the following degrees. He is quite alone in identifying raḥīl with the fourth stage of suspense. Both Streitschrift, 40—41 and Ij 350, describe it as the oath-taking process and so does Baḡhdādī several lines below although there it follows the sixth stage.

² Streitschrift, Introd. 41, (Text No. 5, pp. 6—7), which sets forth this stage more fully characterizes it as a procedure in which knowledge by the general public is denied, intellect and tradition and in particular the apparent meanings of the Kur'ān as criteria of knowledge are criticized. Persuasion is utilized that in adopting these views the novice will not be alone, and that the very finest people (some names of men who live far away are mentioned: cf. Hebrew saying לחןן פרחןן לפנןן למרחןן), entertain the same views. Cf. Ij 350 last line.

³ The correct vocalization of the word is فراق.

⁴ Sura 89, V. 13. The ordinary meaning of this sentence is that the wall will separate between the righteous and the wrongdoers, the former finding grace inside the door within nearer reach of Paradise. See Baiḡ. ad loc. A good specimen of Bāḡinīe interpretation of the Kur'ān, believed by Guyard (315) to be part of a complete commentary, will be found Guyard, 202—217 (trans. 302—318).

⁵ Sura 33, V. 7. The same sentence is cited Ij 350, Streitschrift, Text № 4, (p. 6) where the following verses are also quoted; de Sacy, Introd. 92-93.

They quote to him His words: "Do not break the oaths after making them fast and you have indeed made Allah a surety for you". Once the beguiled one pledges himself to them by means of strong oaths and by divorce and freeing of the slaves and by the dedication of his property to charity¹² they bind him with them.² They expound to him that side of the interpretation of the external meanings which, they believe, leads to abandoning them.³ If the fool accepts this from them he joins the religion of the Zendiks secretly⁴ and seeks shelter in Islam openly. But if the one engaged by oath shrinks from putting faith in the allegorization of the Zendik Bāḡinīya he keeps it secret in accordance with the terms because he has sworn to them that he will hide whatever mysteries they reveal to him. If he is heedful they administer an oath to him and strip⁵ him of the religion of Islam and say to him at that time: Verily, the esoteric is like the husk and the esoteric like the kernel, and the kernel is better than the husk.⁶

⁷ Abd-al-Kāfir says: One who had joined the movement of the Bāḡinīya, but whom God aided to regain His truth and guided him in loosening their bonds, related to me⁷ that when they bound him by his pledges they said to him: Behold, those who are called prophets such as Nūh, Ibrahim, Mūsa, 'Isa and Muḥammad and all those who claimed the spirit of prophecy were nomians and neocrimancers who aspired to chieftancy over the public, and they deceived them with incantations and enslaved them with their precepts.⁸ This narrator told me: Then the one who revealed this secret to me contradicted himself by declaring to me: It is important for you to know that Muḥammad ibn Isma'īl ibn Ja'far is he who called Mūsa son of 'Amrān from the Bush and said to him: "Behold, I am your

¹ Sura 16, V. 93. ¹² These are the fines for breaking the oath, see p. 147. The reading of Ed. جـ ought perhaps to be amended to جـ.

² The mention of the oath in this particular place is unjustified. See above.

³ This may be the stage of Ta'sīs, also the definition which he gives above of Tadlis seems much more to accord with Ij's description of the seventh stage, 451, lines 1-2. From its content this one appears to be the eighth. Cf. Ij, ib. If this view should be accepted we should not find it necessary to combine Khaṭ' and Salāh as Baḡhdādī is compelled to.

⁴ Reading with MS. لـ; Ed. لـ. ⁵ This is the last stage of Salāh.

⁶ This comparison is met with in all discussions of the Bāḡinīya, e. g. Streitschrift, Ij, Sam'ānī, etc. Cf. REJ, L (1905), 34-5.

⁷ Read جـ; Ed. أ. ⁸ See above 133.

Lord, take off your shoes!¹⁷ Then I said to him: May your eye be inflamed! You asked me to disbelieve in the Eternal Lord, Creator of the universe, urging me, nevertheless, to recognize the divinity of a created human being; and you think that before his birth he was a god who sent Mûsa. Now, if Mûsa, according to you, was a great deceiver², then he whom you believe to have sent him is a worse liar. Then he said to me: May you never prosper, and he regretted having bared his secrets to me. I repented from their heresy.—This is an account of their technique with their followers.

Concerning their oaths³.—Their missionary says to the one who takes the oath: You have imposed upon yourself a covenant with God and an agreement with Him and a pledge to Him and to His apostles, and any or all covenants or agreements which God made with the prophets that you will conceal whatever you hear from me and whatever you know that concerns me or the Imām who is the master of your age or his partisans and followers in this country and in the other countries or those who obey him, whether male or female⁴. Do not reveal of this either much or little and do not bare anything which may lead to it, whether by writing or allusion, except what the Imām, master of the time, permits you or what the one to whom this permission was given⁵ in connection with his missionary activities allows you. You will then act in this matter to whatever limit he extends⁶ to you. You have now taken upon yourself the task of fulfilling your promise con-

¹ Sura 20, V. 12. What the missionary meant of course is that it is the same incarnation as of the one who called Moses. See Guyard, 193-95, and 275-77 and n. 1. (from the point of view of the later Ismāʿīliyya or Assassins).

² Reading with MS. ٤٠٥; Ed. ٤٠٥.

³ This oath is also repeated de Sacy, Introd. 138 ff., and Makrīzī, I, 396-7. Substantially the versions are similar, although the latter is more elaborate.

⁴ This extreme secrecy is held by them in common with the Ikhwān al-Safā with whom they are also closely related otherwise. Goldziher, Koranslegung, 191, n. 4. An illustration of it is afforded in the answer given by Abū-l-Fawāris when the Khalfī al-Mutaʿaddī inquired about the belief in the incarnation of God's spirit in man: ان حلت روح الله فينا يا خيرك وان حلت روح ابليس يا عطفك فلا تسألني يا عطفك.

⁵ Arabic الأمر. According to Jb. 349, (trans. JAOS, II, [1849-50], 280), it is an official title of one of the missionaries whose function it was to act as negotiator with the candidates. ⁶ Ed. ٤٠٥; MS. ٤٠٥.

cerning this, and charge yourself equally in states of good will or anger, desire or fear. Say¹, Amen. When he says Amen, he says to him: You further take upon yourself that you will protect me and those whom I will name, to you from whatever you will protect yourself by the covenant with God and your agreement with Him and your pledge to Him and to His apostles; and you will maintain a sincere relationship with them both openly and secretly. You will not act treacherously towards the Imām or his patronizers or the members of his mission with respect to their lives or their property. You will not apply to these oaths any casuistry nor adhere to anything which will make them invalid.

If you should do anything of this you are severed from God and His apostles and His angels and from all the Scriptures which God has revealed. Further, if you should transgress anything of what we imposed upon you, then you owe it to God to make a hundred pilgrimages² to His house on foot, regarding it as an obligatory vow. Everything which you possess during the period when you are in this state shall be forfeited as charity to the beggars and needy. Any slave who is in your possession on the day when you have transgressed or thereafter shall be set free. Any wife of yours at present or on the day of your trespass or one whom you should marry afterwards shall be divorced from you by a triple divorce³. God is an adequate witness to your intention and your hidden beliefs about what you have sworn to. When he says Amen, he says to him: God is an adequate witness between us and between you.

When the victim takes these vows he thinks that he cannot violate them, but the dupe does not know at all that from their standpoint their vow is neither valid nor inviolable. For they see no sin in making it or breaking it, nor blasphemy, nor shame, nor punishment in the world to come. How can an oath by God or by his Scriptures or by his messengers possess sacredness for them when they do not confess in an eternal God; nay, they do not¹ acknowledge the creation of the world and do not accept a book revealed from heaven or an apostle to whom a revelation was made from heaven? Or how can the oath of the Muslims have a sacred character for them when it is a tenet of their religion that the merciful, compassionate God is merely their chief in whose behalf they make propaganda? Those among them who incline to the religion of the Magians maintain that God is Light and against Him stands Satan whom He overcame and dismissed from His kingdom. Furthermore, how can the votive pilgrimage or prescribed visit to Mecca possess any meaning for them, when they ascribe no importance to the Ka'ba and ridicule the person who makes a pilgrimage or pays the visit? Finally, what sanctity can a divorce-act have for them when they consider relations with every woman lawful without the marriage contract? This is a clear account of the law of oaths which obtains among them.

¹ With MS. ٤٠٥; Ed. ٤٠٥.

² Makrīzī, ib., de Sacy, Introd. 145, and Streitschrift, Introd. 41, read thirty.

³ Sachau, Muhammedanisches Recht, 13 (§ 37) and 66-8. The divorce is of the type where the man pronounces the required formula three times or actually divorces her three times. It means that he cannot re-marry her unless she was in the meantime married to someone else, and fulfilled certain other requirements.

As regards the law of oaths which is in force among the Muslims, we teach: Every oath which the swearer takes initially by his own dictates is in accordance with his own intention². Every oath taken by him in the presence of a Kādi or a Sultan who orders him to take it is to be considered. If it is an oath following a claim made by a plaintiff against him who denies it, in which the plaintiff is acting unjustly towards the defendant, then the oath of a swearer is in accordance with his own intention³. But if the plaintiff is right and the repudiator acts wrongly towards the claimant, then the oath of the former is interpreted in accordance with the meaning of the judge or the sultan who administered it to him⁴. The oath-taker thereby becomes perfidious with respect to his oath. Since these premises are true, he who investigates the dogmas of the Bāṭiniyya is absolved of his oath in view of the fact that his purpose is to expose their heresy or he desires to do them harm; his vow is, therefore, at his own discretion. If he makes exception in his heart for the will of God then his vow is not binding upon him and he does not break it by revealing the secrets of the Bāṭiniyya to

¹ Supplying γ from MS., missing in Ed.

² i. e. he has the right to make some mental reservation. See Sachau, 731, l. 5-6.

³ i. e. if he swears the truth he may in this case also make a mental reservation. Ib., l. 12-30.

⁴ Ib., 730, last line ff.

the public. His wives are not divorced, his slaves not set free and a compulsory act of charity does not become obligatory upon him. The chief of the Bāṭiniyya is not considered an Imām by the Muslims. Whoever, therefore, reveals his secret does not disclose the secret of an Imām but that of an infidel and a Zandik. It has been transmitted in a well-authenticated tradition: speak of the infidel in so far as it will caution people. This is a description of their wives with those who are ignorant of the faith.

Concerning their method of beguiling the simpletons by instilling doubt. — It is achieved by way of asking them questions about the precepts of the Law, misleading them to believe the opposite of their obvious meaning. Often they question about the physical world, creating the impression that profound learning is involved therein which no one but their chief can comprehend. Some of the queries put forth to the duped one by their missionary are as follows: Why is man endowed with two ears and one tongue? Why does man possess one penis and two testicles? Why are the nerves connected with the brain and the veins with the liver and the arteries with the heart? Why is man distinguished by growth of hair on both his upper and lower eyelids while the other animals have hair growing on their upper eyelids but not the lower? Why are the breasts of the human on his chest and those of other beasts on their bellies? Why does not the horse have nodous lumps or paunches or ankle-bones? What is the difference between living beings which lay eggs and do not bear and between those which bear and do not lay eggs? How can one distinguish between fish from the river and fish from the sea? They ask many similar questions and make believe that the knowledge thereof rests with their chief.

Among their questions on the Kur'ān is the query regarding the meanings of the letters at the beginnings of the Suras, as when He says: *Alif-lam-mim*² or Ra-ha-mim,³ or Ta-sin,⁴ or Ya-sin,⁵ or Ta-ha,⁶ or Kaf-ha-ya-'ain-sad,⁷ or ¹ Some of these questions may be found in de Sacy, Introd., 74 ff. Many of those recorded there are not reported by our author.

² Suras 2, 3, 29, 30, 31, 32 and some others with additional letters.

³ Suras 40-45.

⁴ Sura 27 and with final mīm, 26 and 28.

⁵ Sura 36.

⁶ Sura 20.

⁷ Sura 19.

Generally they ask : What is the meaning of every single letter in the alphabet ? Why does the alphabet consist of twenty nine letters ? Why are some of them provided with points and others are wanting in points ? Why is the joining of some of them with the following letter allowed ? Usually they say to the beguiled ones : What is the meaning of God's word : "And above them eight shall bear on that day the throne of your Lord" ?¹ Why did God make the gates of Paradise eight and the gates of Hell seven ? What is the meaning of His saying : Over it are nineteen ?² What is the advantage of this number ? Often they inquire about verses between which they allege discrepancies, maintaining that no one knows their explanation save their chief. For example, He says : "So on that day neither man nor jinni shall be asked about his sin &c." Yet he declares in another place : "So by your Lord we shall certainly question them all."³ Other questions hear on the precepts, as for example: Why does the morning prayer consist of two ruk'as, the mid-day prayer of four and the evening prayer of three? Why does every ruk'a consist of one bow and two kneeling? Why is an ablution of water required for four limbs and of sand for two? Why is washing required after a seminal discharge, although it is clean in the case of most Muslims, whereas no washing is required after urinating despite its uncleanness in the case of everyone? Why does a menstruating woman make good whatever fast-days she missed but does not make up whatever prayers she missed? Why is the punishment for stealing — amputation of the hand, for adultery — flogging? Why is not the penis cut off with which he committed the act of adultery in the same way as the hand is cut off with which he stole while committing theft? When the deceived one hears these questions from them and turns to them for their ¹ Sura 66, 17. This question finds its echo in Sûfic literature. See Ibn 'Arabî's Futuhât, I, 191 (cited by Asm, lbn Maarrafa, 71). Ibn Hazzam also takes up this verse admitting frankly his failure to grasp its meaning, although he definitely believes in it, and again lays down the following principle so frequently reiterated by him أما علم 'I know' and again لأن قوله الحق يؤمن به يقينا وأنه أعم 'because the saying of the truth is believed in with certainty and it is more comprehensive'. فإن ما قاله ريتا تعالى وطلع في هذا القول ولله عجيبة السموات والارض وكما عسى فيه عجيبة 'For what I saw in the saying of the truth and the wonder of the heavens and the earth and as there may be a wonder in it'. أما حق يقين على ظاهره وهو أعم 'But the truth is certain on its surface and it is more comprehensive'. IH, II, 125-6.

² Sura 74, V. 30. ³ Sura 55, V. 39.

⁴ Sura 15, v. 92. ⁵ Juynboll, 73-4.

⁶ Ib., 72, note 2.

7 Ib., 80.

elucidation they tell him: The knowledge of it rests with our Imām¹ and with the one who was authorized to reveal our secrets. When it is established as a certainty in the mind of the duped one that their Imām or the one authorized by him are the individuals who know the explanations, he is convinced that what is meant by the external interpretation of the Kurān and the Sunna is not the esoteric explanation. With this trickery they make him relinquish the fulfillment of the precepts of the Law. Once he gets habituated to the relinquishment of worship, and allows himself the forbidden things, they lift the veil for him and say to him: If we had an eternal God, free from want of anything, He would have no profit from the bowing and kneeling of mankind, nor from the ceremony of circumambulating a house of stone,² nor from running between two mountains. When he accepts this from them, he is stripped of a belief in the unity of his Lord and becomes a renegade and a Zindik.

'Abd-al-Karim says: The retort to them in answer to the questions which they propose with the aim of instilling doubt into the hearts of the ignorant regarding the fundamental dogmas of religion can be made from two angles. In the first place, it can be said to them: You cannot escape one of two conclusions. Either you admit the creation of the world and confirm to it a Maker eternal, knowing, wise, with the power to impose on mankind whatever charge He pleases in any way He wishes, or you deny this, and profess the eternity of the world and the denial of the Maker. Now, if you believe in the eternity of the world and the non-existence of its Maker, wherefore you do not confess in a God who made anything obligatory or prohibited it, created it or fashioned it, there is no sense in your asking Why did God ordain this, or why did He prohibit that; why did He create this, and why did He create that after that pattern? Therefore, the discussion between us and you becomes like the discussion between us and the Materialists about the problem of the creation of the universe. But if you aver the origination-in-time of the universe and the unity of its Maker and you admit His power to demand whatever obedience He chooses in the form of worship, then this capacity of His is an answer to you ¹ This attitude is called Ta'im and has given the sect the name Ta'imiyā. See Streitschrift, Intro'd., 5 ff.

² This and the following rites are ceremonies connected with the pilgrimage.

when you ask: why did He ordain this and why did He forbid that? For you recognize His capacity to do this, once you believe in Him and in the possibility of His demanding obedience from people.¹ Similarly their queries about the sensible properties lose their value if they affirm the existence of a Maker Who caused them to be. But if they deny a Maker then there is no point to their question: Why did God create this? seeing that they deny that it had an eternal Creator.

The second way of replying to them and to their inquiries about riddles of creation is to say to them: In what way are the chiefs of the Bāṭiniyya specially gifted with a knowledge of causes, when the doctors and philosophers have discussed them in their books? Aristotle composed a work on the natures of animals, yet the philosophers have related nothing of this branch of knowledge which is not stolen from the Arab scholars who lived before the period of the wise men,² such as the Kaṭāniyya, the Jaḥamiyya, the Tasmiyya, and the other ḥimyarite tribes. In their poems and proverbs the Arabs discuss the various traits of the animals. Yet in their time no Bāṭini lived, nor any Bāṭini leader. However, Aristotle took the distinction between breeding animals and those that lay eggs from the Arabs who state in their proverbs: Every animal with slit ears³ is a breeder and those hard of hearing lay eggs. For this reason the bat⁴ among the birds is a breeder and does not lay eggs, because it has long ears. All those which are hard of hearing lay eggs, like the serpent and lizard and the egg-laying birds.

Abu 'Ubaida Māmar ibn al-Muthanna⁵ and 'Abd-al-Malik ibn Kurayb al-

¹ This standpoint is fully in consonance with the theological views of the Ash'arites to which our author adheres almost blindly. See the discussion below on orthodox Islam.

² This is a typical medieval claim.

³ See Ibn Kulaiba, 'Uyūn al-Aḥbār (ed. Brockelmann) 474, l. 12-14. Al Asma'i's definition in Haṭṭer, Abhandlungen z. arab. Lexikographie, establishes the meaning beyond doubt: دور في الأذن فسي (135). The same statement occurs Usul, 29, but there the reading is دور (long ears). Al-Kazwini's Nuḥat al-Qulub (trans. Stephenson), 2, tells us that "those whose ears project from their heads bring forth their young and those whose ears do not project lay eggs." This definition agrees with 'Uyūn.

⁴ See 'Uyūn, 477-8.

⁵ Born 107 A. H. in Basra of Jewish parents, died 210. He was a Kharijite and Shi'ite. See Brockelmann, Gesch. d. arab. Lit., I, 103-4; Ikhall, III, 388 ff. where numerous works on animals are credited to him. On his erudition see Goldziher, Muh. St., I, 194-6.

Asma'i¹ relate that during the Age of Ignorance the Arabs taught on the basis of their experience² that all animals have lashes on their upper eyelids but t on the lower, whereas the human has lashes growing on both the upper and the lower lids³. They say: All animals will swim when thrown into water, except men, monkeys, and sluggish horses; these will drown, but man can acquire the art of swimming⁴. They tell that if a man's head should be chopped off and he thrown into the water, he will rise to an upright position in the water⁵. They say further: All birds have their palms on their feet, but the palms of the human and the monkey are on their hands. All quadrupeds have their joints in their forelegs⁶ (i.e. hands), but the joints of men are in the legs. They say further: Horses lack nodous lumps, goitres, spleens, and udders, and the male ostrich has no brain⁷. Seabirds and seafish possess neither tongues nor brains⁸, but the fish of the river possess tongues and brains. They state that all fish are devoid of lungs⁹ and consequently¹⁰ do not breathe. The Arabs taught as a result of their experiences that sheep produce once a year¹¹ and ¹ Born 122 A. H. died 216. Like Abu 'Ubaida he also was a pupil of Abu 'Amr ibn al-'Ala. He was a pure Arab and wrote numerous works. See Brockelmann, l. c., 104; Ikhall, II, 121 ff; Goldziher, Abhandlungen z. arab. Philologie, II, 136 and Muh. St. II, 402; Damiri, II, 295-6.

² MS. and Ed. read بما, but marginal reading is بما, which can be allowed to stand or may be corrected to بما, a word which is used further on.

³ 'Uyūn, 456, l. 17-20.

⁴ This sentence occurs verbatim, ib. lines 9-11.

⁵ ib., lines 11-12.

⁶ ib., 457, l. 18-19. He adds بما بما بما, which is the same as our بما.

⁷ This sentence seems to be part of a statement by Abu-'Ubaida and Abu-Zaid that "the horse has no spleen, the camel has no gall-bladder, and the ostrich has no brain". Damiri, II, 176. On the same page, top line, it is remarked that the sayings about the horse and the camel are proverbs for their speed and lack of boldness, respectively.

⁸ ib., part of the above statement.

⁹ ib.

¹⁰ Reading بما, with MS. Ed. بما.

¹¹ The following passage on sheep and goats is found ib. 491, l. 19-492, l. 2. See also Damiri, II, 155.

produce one, not two; but goats gestate twice a year and may produce one or two or three; yet quantity, prosperity and blessing are greater among the sheep than they are among the goats¹. They said: When sheep graze on grass or green wheat they will grow again, but what the goat eats will not grow back because the sheep nibble it with their teeth and the goats root it out². They declared: When the goat gestates, her milk passes down to her udders in the early part of her gestation, but the sheep do not secrete milk until the time of bringing forth³. They taught that the cries of males of all species are louder than the sounds of females except in the case of the goats, the voices of their females being louder than those of the males⁴.

1. See Nuzhat, 7. The goat was generally spoken of disparagingly among the Arabs.

² Ib., 492, lines 15–16.

جاءوا به من لبن وجرى لبنه وجرى لبنه which Lane, s. v. جَرَى and جَرَى respectively translates: "The she-goats have secreted milk in their udders, but wait thou, wait thou (for the bringing forth, for they show signs but do not bring forth until after some time). The ewes have secreted milk in their udders: therefore, prepare thou the جُرَى: prepare thou the جُرَى" (for they will bring forth soon because they begin to secrete milk in their udders at the time of bringing forth)."

⁵ Reading قوظم with Ms; Ed. قهه قضم.

⁷ Ib., 465, lines 12–13; see also ‘Ajātib, ii, 183, 184.

unnaing are that her vulva¹ is inflamed. They said that the dog does not acquire any of his teeth save the molars². They remarked regarding the wolf that he sleeps with one eye and keeps vigil with the other. In view of this, Humaïd ibn Thaur versified regarding him:

The hare sleeps with both eyes open⁴. They said there is no animal with its tongue inverted⁵ except the elephant. Nor is there among the quadrupeds any with his breasts on his chest⁶, except the elephant⁷. They taught that the female elephant produces her young once in seven years, she-ass once a year; the cow resembles woman in this respect. They said that the penis⁸ of the hare and the fox is a bone⁹. They said, every twolegged creature stands on one leg and limps when one of the two is broken, but not the ostrich, for he, when one of his legs is broken, roosts in his place. For this reason the poet sang regarding himself and his brother:

meaning by it that neither of them has any more than his fellow. They said of the female ostrich that she lays from thirty to forty eggs, but that she selects ² Ed. ʕabli; Ms. ʕabli. The reading adopted here is ʕabli, following 'Uyūn, ib. l. 8.

* Ib., 470, l. 6; Nuzhat, 11; 'Ajā'ib, II, 182; al-Damīri, I, 19

⁶ Uyūn, 469, l. 13, reads هو هو. This guided me in the choice of the pronoun his.

والغريب من التيس والور ويحوز الغريب⁸ defines as follows: K. al-Farāḥ, ed. Muller, SBWA, LXXXIII, 242. في كل ذي ذم

¹⁰ Uyūn, 471, l. 14 reads thirty of them and broods over them¹ in a straight line like a stretched thread² Often she abandons her eggs and sits on the eggs of another³. This is why Ibn Harana sang of her:

Like to her who leaves her eggs in the refuse

And covers the eggs of another with her wings⁴.

They said that chicks and chickens are made from the white of the eggs, and that the yolk nourishes them⁵. They said that the sand-grouse lays only single eggs. Concerning the black eagle they told that it lays three eggs and hatches two, throwing one away. But the bird known as the Bone-breaker⁶ hatches it. For this reason the saying goes: More pious than the Bone-breaker. They said that the lizard lays seventy eggs, but she eats whatever hatch from the eggs except those who speedily flee from her⁷. Because of this the saying is current: More undutiful than a lizard⁸. A lizard does not approach water; that is why the proverb says: More watered than a lizard⁹. They stated that a lizard has ¹ 'Uyūn, 473, lines 5-6, relates that she broods over forty but hatches only thirty.

² 'Aḡā'ib, II, 248, states that she divides her eggs into three parts; she buries one, exposes the other to the sun and broods over the third. When these hatch, she breaks those in the sun, now liquefied, and nourishes her young with them. When the chicks grow stronger she digs up those she had buried, punctures a hole in them so that the insects gather, and these make food for the young. Damiṭi, ib., tells the same story.

³ 'Uyūn, 473, lines 10-11; Damiṭi, ib.

⁴ Damiṭi, ib.; Nuzḥat, 91.

⁵ For the first line of this couplet see Damiṭi, ib.

⁶ Read عَجَلِيّ with 'Uyūn, 477, line 16. Ms. and Ed. عَجَلِيّ, عَجَلِيّ.

⁷ The other sources ('Uyūn, 478; Damiṭi II, 105; Aḡā'ib, II, 234; Nuzḥat, 78-9) relate that she throws away not her third egg but her third chick, because, Damiṭi adds (although on p. 273 he cites several other reasons), she finds it difficult to feed three, but the bone-breaker (Kāṣir-al-ṭhām) raises it. Of the bird the authorities have little to say. 'Aḡā'ib merely mentions it; Damiṭi, who discusses it under عَجَلِيّ (the changed one), has nothing more to tell than to identify it as the bird which takes care of the eagle's third chick.

⁸ Damiṭi, II, 65; Aḡā'ib, II, 280.

⁹ 'Uyūn, 460, l. 9, where the same explanation is given for the saying; Damiṭi, ib.

(عَجَلِيّ) and 66, toward the bottom, verbatim.

¹⁰ Damiṭi, II, 64. The saying عَجَلِيّ is given with عَجَلِيّ (frog) 'Uyūn, 461, l. 6; Damiṭi, II, 301, reads عَجَلِيّ عَجَلِيّ. Both authorities quote for the lizard the proverb عَجَلِيّ عَجَلِيّ (more deceiving), 'Uyūn, ib. l. 7; Damiṭi II, 66.

wo penises and the female lizard has two vaginas in front¹. They said of the serpent that it has two tongues² and that its tongue is black, differing in color from the skin. All serpents hate the odor of rue and violet, but they are infatuated with the scent of the apple, the pumpkin and cucumber, the mustard seed, milk and wine³. Of the frogs they related that they do not croak unless they hold water in their mouths⁴ and they will not croak in the Tigris at all, but they do croak in the Euphrates and the other rivers⁵. The poet has sung of the frog:

It takes into its mouth whatever it sucks.

So that it croaks, but the croaking makes it perish⁶, meaning that its croaking calls to it the attention of the snake so that he catches it and devours it. They said that the frog has no bones⁷. Regarding the dung-beetle they related that when it is buried amid flowers it becomes as motionless as though dead, but when it is brought back to the dung it moves⁸.

Now this and whatever else is correct of the properties of living beings and others were known to the Arabs in the Age of Ignorance through their observations, without recourse to the leaders of the Bāṭiniyya, for they knew them a long, long time before the existence of the Bāṭiniyya. In this manner we have exposed the lie of the Bāṭiniyya in claiming that their heads are distinguished by a knowledge of the mysteries and peculiarities of things.

We have accounted for their exclusion from all seeds of Islam to a sufficient degree. Praised be Allah for it.

¹ 'Uyūn, 472, l. 17.

² Damiṭi, I, 239, bottom, explains that its tongue is split so that some think it is doubled.

³ 'Uyūn, 481, l. 10-11. Brockelmann, (Monde Oriental, XIX, 1925, p. 195, is doubtless right in preferring Ed's reading عَجَلِيّ in his edition of 'Uyūn. However, his explanation of عَجَلِيّ as a ditto-graphy for عَجَلِيّ is unnecessary. The existence of the word in the language, even if its meaning is doubtful, cannot be challenged. Furthermore, a marginal gloss in the MS. explains it by عَجَلِيّ (MS. عَجَلِيّ) (cucumbers or watermelons). The snakes' affection for milk is also cited, Damiṭi, II, 840.

⁴ 'Uyūn, 481, lines 17-18. According to Damiṭi the frog will croak if its lower jaw is in the water, but if any water should come into its mouth it will utter no sounds, II, 70.

⁵ None of the other authorities records this peculiarity.

⁶ 'Uyūn, 481. Correct عَجَلِيّ there to read like our text (Brockelmann, Monde Oriental, ib.). Damiṭi, I, 70, cites these verses from 'Abd-al-Kāfir. Can he be possibly referring to our author? His mention of a specific snake comes perhaps from some other work of Baḡdādī.

⁷ Damiṭi, ib.

⁸ 'Uyūn, 482, lines 10-12; Damiṭi, I, 170; Nuzḥat, 40.

SECTION FIVE.

AN ENQUIRY INTO THE CHARACTERISTICS OF THE SAVING SECT AND PROOF OF ITS SALVATION AND ITS ATTRACTIVE FEATURES.

This section comprises a number of chapters, with the following titles:

1. An Enquiry into the Groups composing the People of Tradition and Consensus.
2. An Enquiry into the Proof of Salvation for the People of Tradition and Consensus.
3. The Fundamental Dogmas on which the People of Tradition and Consensus are agreed.
4. The Doctrine of the People of Tradition on the Pious Ancestry of the Nation.
5. God's Preservation of the People of Tradition from accusing one another of unbelief
6. The Excellences of the People of Tradition, the branches of their Sciences and a list of their Leaders.
7. The continued chain of Tradition of the People of Tradition in matters of Religion and Life, and a statement of their glories in both fields.

These are the chapters of this section. We shall give an account in every one of them of all that is required, with the help of God.

CHAPTER ONE.

Know, may God prosper you, that the orthodox community comprises eight divisions. One class possesses a thorough knowledge of the problems of Unity, Prophecy, Dogmas of Promises and Warnings, Reward and Retribution and the necessary pre-requisites for *lyihād*¹, the Imāmate, and the exercise of Authority. In this theological subject-matter they tread the paths of the Ṣifā'iyya among the *Mutakallims*² who declare themselves free from anthropomorphism as well as from divesting God of His attributes, and from the heresies of the Rawā'id, the Khawā'ir, the Jahmiyya, the Najjā'iyya, and the other sects of erring fancies. The second class consists of the chief jurists of both systems: those who apply the method of analogy and those who adhere to tradition³, people who accept the principles of faith in accordance with the doctrines of the Ṣifā'iyya on God and His eternal attributes and steer clear of the Kadarite views and of Mutazilism. They affirm God's vision⁴ with an organ of sight without falling into the error of Tashbīh (anthropomorphism) or of Ta'tīl (divesting.) They acknowledge the resurrection from the grave, affirming at the same time their belief in the examination in the grave⁵, and recognize in addition the truth of the Pool (of the Apostle), the Bridge, Intercession, and forgiveness of sins which are not of polytheistic

¹ Lyihād is the right to make decisions which are to be followed by the community. Those who have this right are called Mufizhidās. See Macdonald's article, EJ, II, 448—9.

² Our author doubtless refers to the school founded by al-Ash'ari. However it is incorrect to employ the name Ṣifā'iyya as a synonym for Ash'ariyya, since it comprises other groups. Shahr, for example, also discusses the Mushabbihā and Karāmiyya under the Ṣifā'iyya. pp. 95—127.

³ The school of Abu Hanifa is an example of the first type; that of Malik illustrates the second.

⁴ Al-Ash'ari's credo is succinctly stated in his Ibāna, 7—13.

⁵ For the following beliefs regarding the future life see below, 209.

character. They hope for the eternal bliss of Paradise to its inhabitants and eternal tortures of hell to unbelievers. They recognize the Imāmate of Abu Bekr, 'Omār, 'Uthmān and 'Alī; and they venerate highly the pious ancestry of the nation. They realize the necessity of congregating for prayer on Fridays under the leadership of Imāms who cut themselves loose from the people of erring fancies. They realize the urgency of extracting the precepts of the law from the Kūrān, Tradition and consensus of opinion among the Companions. They cede to the lawfulness of rubbing the dust off the footgear¹, and the incumbency of divorce in three sentences. They choose to forbid marriage by trial². They urge obedience to the Sufians in whatever does not involve sinfulness.

In this group are included the adherents of Mālik, al-Shāfi', al-Auzā'i, al-Thauri³, Abu Hanīfa, ibn Abū Laila⁴, the adherents of Abū Thaur⁵, the followers of Ahmad ibn Hanbal, the Zāhirites and the other jurists who adhere to the ¹ A practice in place of the footwash before prayer, allowed by the Sunnites under certain circumstances. In consonance with the importance it receives as a cardinal point of difference between orthodoxy and heterodoxy, Strothmann has made it the subject of a characterization of Ihtilāf between the Sunnites and Shi'ites, more particularly Zaidites. See Kullūs d. Zaidites, 21-46, esp. 21-26 and 44-46. See also Vorlesungen, 368-70 (note 147). The Shi'ite Nubakht calls this practice of the Sunnites one of the Aḥkām Abi Bakr wa-'Umar, 12.

² See Ed., 314 (below, 175).

³ 'Abd-al-Rahmān b. 'Amr b. Yūḥmid, one of the earliest jurists of Islām (88-157 A.H.). He was Imām in Syria and lived in Beirut. His code prevailed until it was replaced by the Mālikite. Nawāwī, 382-4; El, s.v. Auzā'i; Sam'ānī, f. 53a.

⁴ Sa'yān b. Sa'īd b. Masrūq, a very famous Muhaddith of Kūfa (79-161 A.H.). Acc. to Goldziher, Muh. St., II, 12, he was more proficient in the mechanical memorization of the Ḥadīth than in the knowledge of its application in daily life. Yet see, in answer to Goldziher, Ikhāl, I, 577. Nawāwī, 386 ff. sings his praises abundantly. He hid from the Khalīf al-Mahdī (Ikhāl, ib.), Fihrist, 225.

⁵ Mujaḥmad b. 'Abd-al-Rahmān of Kūfa (74-148 A.H.). He is said to have been under strained relations with Abū Hanīfa (Ikhāl, II, 584-5) whose predecessor he was in applying the method of Ra'i (Fihrist, 203).

⁶ Ibrahim b. Khālid al-Kalbī, a disciple of Shāfi' (converted to him after having been a Hanīfite) with whom he nevertheless disagreed on many matters and developed his own Madhhab which held sway in Azerbaijan and Armenia. He died 246 A.H. Fihrist, 211; Ikhāl, I, 6.

doctrines of the Sifā'iyya with respect to the rational fundamentals, and do not adulterate their law with any of the heresies of the people of erring fancies.

The third division is made up of those who possess a comprehensive knowledge of the methods of the Ḥadīth and Sunna which are traced to the Prophet, and can discern the sound from the faulty in them. They recognize the reasons for discrediting certain traditions and for pronouncing others trustworthy, and they do not associate with their knowledge of this science any of the heresies of the people of erring fancies. The fourth division consists of people who are extremely well-versed in almost everything pertaining to rhetoric, grammar and inflection. They follow the course of the outstanding personalities in philology, such as al-Khālīl¹, Abū 'Amr ibn al-'Alā², Sibawini³, al-Farrā'⁴, al-Akhṣāsh⁵, al-Asma'i⁶, al-Mazini⁷, Abū 'Uḥaid⁸, and the other scholars in philology, both of the Kufī School and the Basrian School, who do not mix their pursuit of this ¹ Al-Khālīl b. Aḥmad, founder of the study of Arabic meter. Lived in Basra 100-175 A.H. Fieuegel, Schulien, 37-38, 42; Ikhāl, I, 493ff.; Brockelmann, I, 100.

² One of the seven readers of the Kūrān, and founder of the school of Philology at Basra. Fieuegel, 32-34; Ikhāl, II, 399ff.; Brockelmann, I, 99.

³ The foremost grammarian of Arabic, though himself a Persian. 'Amr b. 'Uthmān b. Kanbar died 180 A.H. and was called al-Jalī جلي. Fieuegel, 43-45; Ikhāl, II, 396-98; Brockelmann, I, 100-02.

⁴ Abū Zakariya Yalīya b. Ziyād b. 'Abdallah b. Mansūr al-Dailami (d. 207), a pupil of al-Kisā'i of the Kufī School. He was one of the most famous philologists and some one even expressed the opinion that "without al-Farrā' there would be no Arabic." Fieuegel, 129-36; Sam'ānī, f. 420a; Brockelmann I, 116.

⁵ Al-Akhṣāsh is the name of several noted grammarians. Our author may either have had them all in mind or he referred to al-Akhṣāsh al-Akbar whose name is 'Abd-al-Ḥamid b. 'Abd-al-Majīd Abū-l-Khaliḥ, a native of Hajar who died in 177. He collected dialectical expressions among the Arabs. Fieuegel, 61; Ikhāl, II, 244; Nujūm, I, 485; El, I, s. v.

⁶ See above, 153, note 1.

⁷ Jahn b. Khalaḥ, a contemporary of al-Asma'i. He was well-versed in rare expressions and in poetry; he also wrote works on insects and replies. Fieuegel, 50.

⁸ Abū 'Uḥaid al-Kāsim b. Saḥīm al-Ḥarawī was born in Herāḥ about 150 and died in Mecca or Medina about 227. He studied under al-Asma'i; lived in Khurāsān and Tarsus; wrote a long dictionary and other works. Fieuegel, 85-6; Ikhāl, II, 486-89; Brockelmann, I, 106-7; El, I, 112.

study with any of the innovations of the Kadariya, the Rawāfiḍ and the Khawārij. Any one of them who inclines towards any of the erring fancies cannot be regarded orthodox and his teaching carries no weight in matters of language and grammar.

The fifth division consists of those who have gathered extensive knowledge about the variant readings in the Kur'ān and the manner of expounding and interpreting the verses of the Kur'ān in accordance with the dogmas of the orthodox, and not with the interpretations of the people of erring fancies. The sixth group is made up of the Ṣūfī ascetics who indulge in study and abstain from pleasure, are well-informed and deliberate in reasoning, resigned to fate and content with the obtainable. They know that the organs of hearing and seeing and the heart are all to be called to account for even the weight of a grain of sand. They make the most careful preparations for the world to come. Their discourses in the fields of interpretation and guidance pursue the course of the Traditionists and not of those who adopt a mocking attitude to tradition; they do not practise good for appearance's sake nor do they abandon it for shame.

In their religious philosophy they proclaim the Unity of God and divest Him of anthropomorphism; their way of life is that of committing their care to God, entrusting themselves to Him, submitting to His command, feeling satisfied with whatever has been bestowed upon them and abstaining from any rebelliousness against Him. "That is the grace of Allah; He gives it to whom He pleases, and Allah is the Lord of mighty praise".¹

The seventh division consists of people who defend the Muslim frontiers against the infidels, fight the enemies of the Muslims and protect the Muslims. They repel them from their sacred precincts and their homes and observe the law of Orthodox Islam at the front. It is they concerning whom God has revealed His Word: "And as for those who strive hard for Us, We will most certainly guide them in Our ways".² May God increase their reward in His excellence and benevolence. The eighth is made up of the general population of the cities among whom the practices of the orthodox prevail; but not the population of the provinces among whom the rites of the people of fantasy and error are practised. We understand by this group of the general population only the public which attaches itself to that which is approved by the orthodox learned men in relation to the problems of Justice and Unity, Reward and Punishment; who regard them as guide-posts in their faith and make them examples in the derived laws, in matters of the allowed and the forbidden. They do not attach themselves to any of the innovations of the people of erring fancies. They are the ones whom the Ṣūfīs call the padding of Paradise.

These are the divisions of Orthodox Islam. Those included in them are adherents of the true religion and the straight path. May God make them endure with the permanent Word in the life of this world and in the future life. Verily in favorable response He is competent, and of it He is capable.

¹ Sura 57, v. 21.

² Sura 29, v. 69.

CHAPTER TWO.

AN ENQUIRY INTO THE PROOF OF SALVATION FOR THE PEOPLE OF TRADITION AND CONSENSUS.

We have already related in the first section of this book¹ that when the Prophet spoke of the schisms among his people to the number of seventy-three sects, and declared that one of these would be saved, he was asked regarding this sect and its characteristics. In reply to this, he pointed to those who followed his path and the path of his Companions. We cannot find in our day among the sects of the nation any which is in agreement with the Companions other than the Orthodox among the jurists of the nation and the Šī'ite Muta-kallims; not the Rawāfiḍ, nor the Kadariyya, nor the Khawārij, nor the Jahmiyya, nor the Najāfiyya, nor the Mushabbihā, nor the Ghulāt, nor the Huḍilīyya.

As for the Kadariyya, how can they be said to be in agreement with the Companions when their outstanding man al-Nazzām attacked most of the Companions and denied the uprightness of ibn Mas'ūd? He imputed error to him

¹ Ed. 4-5 (Seelye, 21-2). The error which gave rise to this tradition has been pointed out by Goldziher in Revue de l'Histoire des Religions, XXVI, 129-37, and in his study Beiträge z. Literaturgeschichte d. Schi'a unt. d. Sunnitischen Polemik in SBWA, LXXVIII, (1874) 445. See also Seelye, Introd., 2-3. It is interesting, in connection with this tradition and the use made of it by our author, to cite its Mu'tazilite version as it is alleged to have been told by Sufyān al-Thaurī in the name of jābir b. 'Abdallāh; إخبرني جابر بن عبد الله قال سئل عن جماعة من أصحاب النبي صلى الله عليه وآله وسلم قالوا لا نعلم من كان مع الصادق في ذلك يوم روي واحدة واحدة.

² 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd is one of the most outstanding traditionalists and one of Muḥammad's most intimate friends. See his biography in Ibn Hajar's Biogr. of Persons Who Knew Muḥammad, II, 890-893 (†9302). Baḡdādī's statement that in not crediting Ibn Mas'ūd al-Nazzām is guilty of denying the Prophet's miracles is not clear to me. In Bukhārī, III, 26, the tradition of the cleaving of the moon has several sanzads in which Ibn Mas'ūd does not figure on account of his traditions in the name of the Prophet that he is prosperous who was destined to be prosperous while in his mother's womb, and he is unhappy for whom unhappiness was decreed in his mother's womb, and his tradition regarding the cleaving of the moon.³ This is his attitude only because he denies the miracles of the Prophet. He inveighed against the rulings of 'Umar because he inflicted eighty stripes for wine drinking⁴ and banished Naṣr ibn al-Ḥajjāj to Basra when he feared the disturbance⁵ of the women of al-Medīna because of him⁶, 305 at all, and one of those in which he figures is not finally dependent on him but on 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās. See also ib., 341-2. The same may be said of the traditions reported in Muslim V, 386 (Nawāwī's defence of the truthfulness of the tradition, ib., is very interesting. Cf. also Streitschrift, 65, for Ghazālī's defence in approximately the same vein. Andrae, 107, Mukhtalif al-Hadīth, 31). In Tirmidhī the tradition is reported without Ibn Mas'ūd at all, II, 28. He however, adds: قال أبو عيسى وفي الباب عن ابن مسعود وأبي هريرة. Similarly, a variety of sources exists for the tradition about the decree. It is reported ultimately on the authority of Anās b. Mālīk (Bukh IV, 251, and Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, III, 116), of Ḥudhaifa (ib., IV, 6; he, too, was attacked by al-Nazzām, Mukhtalif al-Hadīth, 27), of jābir b. 'Abdallāh (A. b. Ḥ, III, 387), and of others (Tirmidhī, II, 20). On 'Abdallāh's caution in reporting Ḥadīths see Goldziher, ZDMG, LXI, (1907), 860.

³ This tradition is reported in a different version in the name of Ibn Mas'ūd in Muslim, V, 271: إخبرني جابر بن عبد الله قال سئل عن جماعة من أصحاب النبي صلى الله عليه وآله وسلم قالوا لا نعلم من كان مع الصادق في ذلك يوم روي واحدة واحدة. The idea of the saying is supported by the tradition under Kadar in Bukhārī, IV, 251; Muslim V, 269ff. Cf. Iḍā'at, 86. For other sources see above note.

⁴ For al-Nazzām's attack on Ibn Mas'ūd see Ed. 134 (reading Abū should be corrected to bn), Seelye, 155. (Her reading is to be corrected as well and her references are irrelevant since they do not concern our traditionalists.) For his denial of the splitting of the moon, see Makrīzī, II, 346 and Shahr, 40, and ist. f. 31a. — Al-Nazzām's objection to the two traditions is no surprise. His Kadarism could not endure either the disturbance of the order of the world predicated by the tradition about the moon, nor the determinism implicit in the other. See Mukhtalif al-Hadīth, 25-6.

⁵ See Kitāb al-Umm, VI, 130-31; Mukhtalif al-Hadīth, 195-6.

⁶ With MS. 433; Ed. 433.

⁷ It is related in Ibn Sa'd, III, I, 204-5 and Ikhlāḥ, I, 359, that 'Umar was annoyed with the fact that this handsome Naṣr was "celebrated by young females in the privacy of their apartments" and, deciding to send him away from the city where he lived, he banished him to Basra. Shahr, ib., also mentions this incident. None of the major historians report it. Ibn Hajar in his biography of Naṣr's father, al-Ḥajjāj, b. 'Uḡā, (I, 642), promises us a biography of

But this can be explained on his part simply by the lack of zeal for the sacred cities. He also assailed the ruling on the slave-mothers of children, made by 'Ali, who said: "Verily my opinion is that they may be sold." Al-Nazzām demanded: Who is he to pronounce judgments based on his own opinion? He reprehended 'Uthmān because of his edict regarding al-Kharkā'² that property is to be divided equally into three parts among the grandfather, the mother and the sister. He charged Abu Huraira with falsification³ because many of his traditions contradict the dogmas of the Kadariyya. He condemned the rulings by way of ḥijāb issued by any one of the Companions. He said that they did this only for two reasons: either because they did not know that they were not permitted to do it, or because they wished to be chiefs and leaders of *madhāhib*⁴ which are ascribed to them. He characterized the traditions⁵ of the Companions as the result of ignorance or hypocrisy.

In his opinion, any one who is ignorant of the precepts of the law is a non-believer, and he who believes contrariwise with no convincing proof is a hypocritical infidel or a wicked transgressor. He thus deemed eternal hell inevitable for the chief Companions; he himself belongs there more rightfully. He further rejected the validity of ḥijāb among the Companions, not considering it⁶ the son but he seems to have failed to keep his promise. See a fuller account of Naṣr in Subki, Tabaḥkāt, I, 147—9. Cf. Caetani, Annali dell'Islam, Anno 23, § 313—14, esp. note.

¹ In Ed. 134 (Seeve 154—5; the passage is mistranslated) he challenges 'Ali's right to base judgments on his opinion in connection with the question of a cow that killed a donkey this is borne out by Mukhtalif al-Ḥadīth, 25; on the question under discussion here 'Ali is said to have changed his mind, ib., 195. Our passage refers to the case of a mother of a child born of concubinage—the term is Umm-Walad—and whether she can be sold after the death of her child's father. See Jaynbul, 206, 236, and Sachau, 127, 168—75, where the law is that she cannot be sold. In defence of 'Ali's ruling cf. Mukhtalif al-Ḥadīth, 199—200.

² I have not been able to identify the name. For the ruling see Sachau, 248, and 252 sqq.

³ Abu Huraira, one of the most intimate Companions of the Prophet, is credited with more traditions than any one else. On the ease with which he manufactured traditions see ZDMG, L (1896), 487ff. and LXI (1907), 860. See also Zahrīth, 78—9, and Kremer, Orient unter d. Chalifen, trans. S. Khuda Bukhsh, 56 note.

⁴ i. e. rites followed by sections of the community.

⁵ With MS. ⁶ أخبار; Ed. ⁷ أخبار.

⁸ Reading أخبار with MS; Ed. ⁹ أخبار.

as convincing proof. He thought it possible for the community to agree on an error¹. Now, how can he be considered to walk in the path of the Companions and to imitate their ways who believes it a duty to contradict all of them, since his opinion is the converse of theirs?

Their founder Wāṣil ibn 'Aḡā questioned the integrity of 'Ali and his two sons, of ibn 'Abbās, of Talha, of al-Zubair, of 'Aṣha and of all members of either party who participated in the Battle of the Camel². Because of this he declared: If 'Ali or Talha were to testify before me about a bundle of vegetables, 306 I would not pronounce judgment on the basis of their testimony; for I know that one of them is a sinner but do not know exactly who it is. According to his principle it is likely that 'Ali and his followers are sinners, condemned to eternal hell, it is equally possible that the other party known as the Party of the Camel is tortured in hell eternally. He doubted the rectitude of 'Ali, Talha and al-Zubair despite the Prophet's promise of Paradise to the three of them³ and despite their joining the oath called Bī'at al-Riḡwān¹ and their inclusion within the entire group concerning whom God declared: "Certainly Allah was well pleased with the believers when they swore the oath of allegiance to you under the tree".

'Amr ibn 'Ubad⁵ agreed with the views of Wāṣil on the two parties at the Battle of the Camel and even exceeded him by being convinced of the sinfulness of each of the two parties. For Wāṣil was certain that one of the parties sinned; he would not pronounce judgment on the basis of testimony given by two men one of whom was of 'Ali's party and the other of the Party of the Camel, but he would accept the testimony of two men who were both members

¹ Ed. 129 (Seeve 149) Mukhtalif al-Ḥadīth, 21—2. Acc. to Inḍiṣār, 51, al-Nazzām did not hold this view; al-Khayyāṭ attributes it to al-Jāhiz.

² On the Orthodox attitude to the participants in this battle, see below.

³ Tirmidhi, II, 314; Ṭayānisi, #236.

⁴ The pledge of mutual loyalty by Muḥammad's men taken under the tree at al-Ḥadaiyya, at which time a truce was arranged with the Quraysh (6 a.H.) see Bukhārī, III, (trans. III, 144). The name Yawn al-Riḡwān comes from the beginning word of the Qur'ānic verse quoted immediately in the text.

⁵ Sura 48, v. 18.

⁶ See on him Ed. 101—2 (Seeve, 123—5).

of 'Ali's party or of two men who were both members of the party of the Camel. But 'Amr ibn 'Ubad declared: I will not accept the testimony of any of them no matter whether they be all of one party or whether some of them are of 'Ali's group while others are of the Camel group. He maintained that both parties alike were transgressors. According to his premise, it necessarily follows that 'Ali and his two sons, Ibn 'Abbās, 'Ammār, Abu Ayyūb al-Anṣārī, Khuzaima ibn Thābit¹ al-Anṣārī whose testimony the Prophet ranked as highly as that of two upright men, and the remaining associates of 'Ali, as well as Talha, al-Zubair, 'Aisha, and the other members of the Camel, with thousands of Companions in their midst, are all sinners doomed to eternal hell. There were with 'Ali twenty-five heroes of the Battle of Badr and most of the participants in the Battle of Uhud, six hundred Anṣārs and a number of the first fugitives.

Abu-l-Hudhail and al-Jāhiz and most of the Kadariyya were of the same opinion in this matter as Wāsil ibn 'Aḥā. But how can anyone be said to follow the footsteps of the Companions when he declares most of them to be sinners and regards them as people condemned to hell? How can he who does not regard their testimony valid accept traditions transmitted by them? But whosoever rejects their traditions and rejects their testimony ceases to walk in their path and to follow them. Only he initiates them who acts in accordance with their traditions and accepts their testimony in the manner of the People of Tradition and Consensus.

The Khawārij also declare 'Ali and his sons, as well as Ibn 'Abbās and Abu Ayyub al-Anṣārī to be infidels. They also brand 'Uthmān, 'Aisha, Talha and al-Zubair as unbelievers, and everyone who did not secede from 'Ali and Muḥāwiya after the arbitration². They call any sinner in the community an infidel. But he who believes in branding most of the Companions as infidels cannot be on the right path trodden by them.

As for the Ghulāt among the Rawāfiḍ, such as the Sabbābiyya, the Bayāniyya, the Muḥitiyya, the Maṣṣiḥiyya, the Janābiyya, the Khaṭiābiyya and the other Huṭhiyya, we have already demonstrated their exclusion from Islam, and we have also proved that they are in the ranks of idol-worshippers or among the ranks of the Christian Huṭhiyya. But neither the idol-worshippers nor Christians nor other infidels can point to a pattern or model among the Companions.

¹ See Ibn Hajar, Biography, I, 875-7, where the same tradition about his trustworthiness is related (876).

² See below 213-5.

Concerning the Zaidiyya. — The Jāridiyya among them declare Abu Bekr, 'Umar, 'Uthmān and most of the Companions to be infidels. He who declares most of them to be unbelievers cannot copy them. The Sulāmaniyya and the Butriyya¹ condemn 'Uthmān as an infidel or else they maintain a neutral attitude regarding him but condemn his defenders as sinners and brand most of the members of the Camel as heretics.

As for the Imāmiyya, most of them adhere to the view that the Companions, with the exception of 'Ali, his two sons, and about thirteen others, apostasized after the decease of the Prophet. The Kāmilīyya believe that 'Ali also became an apostate and a heretic by refraining from making war upon them². How can he be on the right path of the Companions who asserts that they are infidels? Therefore we say: how can the Rawāfiḍ or the Khawārij or the Kadariyya or the Jahmiyya or the Najfariyya or the Bakriyya or the Dirariyya be in concord with the Companions? All alike they do not accept as authentic anything which has come down by tradition on the authority of the Companions regarding the precepts of the law. For they refrain from accepting traditions of the Ḥadīth and the Lives of the Prophet and the heroic deeds on account of their branding as infidels the authors of the Ḥadīth, who are the transmitters of the reports and the Aḥadīth-traditions³, and the narrators of the Histories and Lives; and on account of their condemning the jurists of the community who have preserved the traditions of the Companions and have obtained by analogy the derivative institutions of the law from the opinions of the Companions. There has not arisen, by God's grace and favor, a leading jurist, or a leading traditionist, or an outstanding rhetorician and grammarian, or a person credible in transmitting deeds of heroism or Lives of the Prophet or histories, nor was there an Imām for warning and exhorting, nor an authority in interpretation and exegesis of the Qur'ān among status of saints and the grades of the pious Imams. The fifteenth is knowledge of the laws bearing on the enemies among the non-believers and the people of erring fancies¹. As for these principles, the Orthodox are agreed about their basic character and they accuse of error anyone who contradicts them. Every essential involves fundamental propositions and derived propositions. They agree on their fundamentals but generally differ regarding some of their derived principles to an extent which does not compel mutual accusations of erring or sinning.

¹ With MS; Ed ḥuṭhiyya.

² Ed., 39 (See below 60).

³ See below.

Concerning the first essential: the confirmation of realities and knowledge.— Agreement prevails about recognizing knowledge as inherent ideas in the learned, and they believe those to be in error who deny the reality of knowledge and the other properties. They brand the Sophists² as ignorant because they deny knowledge and the reality of all things, and regard them as opposing that which has long been incontrovertibly known. The same is true of the Sophists who maintain a skeptical view about the existence of realities, or of those who assert that the reality of things is based on belief, and who call all beliefs acceptable despite their mutual inconsistency and their incompatibility³. These three groups are all heretics for rejecting the incontrovertible, rational axioms.

The Orthodox declare that the kinds of knowledge possessed by men and those possessed by other living beings are three; intuitive, perceptive, and inductive⁴.

¹ The same list will be found in Uṣūl, 1—2. Our entire chapter is a concise digest of the other work of the author, whose artificial character has already been pointed out by Josef Schacht in the OLZ, XXXII (1929), 506.

² In Uṣūl, 6—7, Baghdādī gives a fuller, though substantially similar description of the three types of Sophists and also refutes their respective positions. The sophistry to which he himself falls a victim is best illustrated in the following argument which seems to have been a stock-argument with the Muslim scholars. (It is employed by H, I, 8, and by Murṭada; see Herten, Probleme, 48): They should be asked: Has the denial of realities a reality? If they should answer yes, they affirm one reality. But if they should say no, they can be told: Since the denial of realities has no reality therefore their denial is not admissible and the affirmative is true. (Uṣūl, 6)

³ "They are forced to admit that the world is pre-existent and created because some people believe in its creation and others in its eternity", ib., 7.

⁴ Uṣūl, 8—9. These three sources are also enumerated by the Jewish Philosophers Bahya b. Pakuda in his Far'īd-al-Kuṭūb (ed. Yahuda) 79, (Heb. trans., ed. Zifroni, 48), and Sa'adia in Emunoth We-de'oth (Yusuf ed.), 43, ff. Cf. Creencia, 52ff.

They declare: He who disacknowledges intuitive knowledge or perceptive knowledge acquired through the five senses is an Oppositionist; he who denies speculative knowledge established by deductive or inductive proof is to be more closely observed. If he is one of the Sumanīya¹ who reject speculative reasoning in rational knowledge, then he is a godless infidel. His status is like the status of the Materialists since he, like them, professes the eternity of the world and denies the existence of the Maker, while he goes beyond them in his demand for the abrogation of all religions. If he is of those who credit speculative reasoning in matters intellectual but reject analogy in the derived institutions of the law like the Zāhīriya², he is not an infidel as a result of his rejection of analogy in legal matters.

They believe that the senses with which the phenomena are perceived are five³: vision, for perceiving visible sensations⁴; hearing, for perceiving audible sensations; taste, for feeling tastes; smell, for detecting odors; and touch, for sensing hot and cold, wet and dry, soft and hard. They say that the perceptions coming from these senses are inherent in the organs which are called senses. They accuse Abu Hāshim ibn al-Jubai of error because of his contention that the act of perceiving is neither an idea nor an accident nor anything else but the thing perceived⁵.

They teach that indirect information which is handed down without interruption serves as a necessary recognition of the truth of what has been transmitted uninterruptedly, if that information is of the kind which can be attested or perceived either with the senses or axiomatically. Such, for example, is the conviction of the real existence of any country which one who obtains the knowledge⁶ by

¹ See above 91 note 1; Uṣūl, 10—11.

² Goldziher points out clearly in his work Zahiriyyen that that school is distinct only in its legalistic views (مدني قضي) and not in its theological dogmas (مدني فلاسفة), 131—3. It may be added that Ibn Hāzim is one notable exception in this respect.

³ Uṣūl, 9—10.

⁴ Vision, and not hearing, as the philosophers think, is the most excellent sense of all the five acc. to the Muṭakallims, ib., 10.

⁵ Ed., 183 (Seeley 204).

⁶ With MS. السامع القدر; Ed. السامع القدر.

information has never visited, such knowledge having been transmitted unbroken; or our knowledge of the existence of prophets and kings who lived before us. As for the veracity of the claims of prophets regarding prophecy it is known to us by logical arguments. They declare as infidels those of the Sumanīya who deny the admissibility of acquiring knowledge by way of unbroken traditions.

They say: The reports which oblige us to act in accordance with them are of three kinds¹: a report transmitted without interruption (Tawāṭur), information reported by a few (Aḥād), and the mean between these two — news which spreads (Mustaḥḍ). A report transmitted without interruption, which it would be absurd to agree to manufacture, necessarily obliges us to recognize the truth of its contents. By this sort of communication we learn about the countries which we have not visited; by it we become acquainted with the kings and prophets and generations that existed before our time. By it a man knows his parents to whom he is linked. Information transmitted by a few, provided its Isnād is trustworthy and its contents do not seem absurd to the mind, compels action in accordance with it but not acceptance of it². It has the same standing as the testimony of honest witnesses before the judge, in that it compels him outwardly to decide in accordance with it although he may not know their credibility with respect to the testimony. By this kind of information the jurists have established most of³ the derived precepts of the law bearing on works and deeds and the other classes of the allowed and the forbidden. They accuse of error anyone who repudiates the duty of acting in accordance with that type of information as a whole, such as the Rawāfiḍ, Khawārij and the other people of fancies. News which circulates, the mean between Tawāṭur and Aḥād, shares a characteristic in common with Tawāṭur in that it imposes both recognition and action in accordance with it, but is distinguished from Tawāṭur in that knowledge resulting from it is acquired logical knowledge, whereas knowledge based on Tawāṭur is necessary, not acquired. This source of information falls into several classes: one, the accounts of prophets about themselves and the account [about them] told by a person of whose trustworthiness the Prophet has told us; the recognition of its truth¹ is acquired. Another is the report which is spread by one person. When he relates it in the presence of a group of people who cannot be believed to have agreed on a lie, and demands from them acceptance of that which he related in their presence, then if no one contradicts him we recognize his veracity regarding it. Through this type of report we learn of the miracles of the Prophet, such as the cleaving of the moon, his making pebbles utter praises in his hand², the longing of the tree for him when he departed from it³, his filling many people with little food⁴ and similarly other miracles of his. But the Kurʿān, whose composition is in the nature of a miracle [does not fall in this category]; for the confirmation of the Kurʿān and its revelation to him, and the failure of Arabs and heathens to emulate it⁵, are known by Tawāṭur which obliges men to necessary knowledge. To this division belong the traditions current among the Imāms of the Ḥadīth and the Fīqh about the truth of which they are of unanimous opinion as, for example, the traditions about Intercession, the Reckoning, the Pool, the Bridge, the Balance, the Tortures in the Grave, and the Questioning by the two angels in the Grave. Similarly the traditions which circulate among many doctors of the law, such as the fixing⁶ of a minimum wealth from which alms-giving is required and the traditions bearing on it⁷, the punish-

¹ With MS. قوله; Ed. قوله.

² This tradition does not appear in any of the collections examined by Wensinck, so that it is of a later date. It is cited in the Shiʿite biography of Muḥammad, Ḥayāt-ul-Kulūb, 161. It is also cited Usūl, 182, with the additional comment: قوله.

³ Of this tradition no mention is made by Wensinck. Nawāwī, 42, mentions قوله and قوله. Cf. also II, V, 7.

⁴ There are many versions of this tradition. For reference see Wensinck, s. v. Muḥammad, 166 b. and 167 a. The stories agreeing most closely with the wording in our text will be found Bukhārī, III, 95, 493, 508 (trans. III, 124, 656, 675). Cf. Andrae, 46—7. For a biblical parallel, see II Kings IV, 42—44.

⁵ See below 204; Andrae, 94ff.

⁶ The reading muṣṭab is attested by the MS., and it is not necessary to change it to muṣṭab as Brockelmann suggests.

⁷ The words in the text قوله are difficult to interpret. Brockelmann's suggestion (ib. 109) that we read قوله, "Zwang zum Verzicht auf die Talio" seems too far-fetched. Goldziher's emendation قوله is the one adopted here.

¹ Usūl, 12—14.

² This distinction is commonly accepted as orthodox. See Isṭiṣṣāṭ, III (1912), 230—33.

³ MS. adds قوله, which Ed. has omitted.

ment for wine-drinking, the tradition about rubbing the foot-gear, stoning¹, and others among the traditions which the jurists have agreed to credit and to act in accordance with the contents thereof. They have accused of error any of the people of ering fancies who contradict them: the Khawārij for their denial of stoning; those among the Najādī who deny the punishment for wine-drinking; those who deny the rubbing of the foot-gear. They accuse of heresy anyone who denies God's visibility, the Pool, Intercession, and the Tortures of the Grave. By the same token, they ascribe error to the Khawārij who cut off the hand² of the thief for petty and grand larceny, regardless of whether the stolen goods were well guarded or unguarded articles³, because⁴ they reject the trustworthy traditions regarding the establishment of a minimum value and of protection, for punishment by amputation. Just as they declare anyone to be mistaken who rejects the correct traditions, so they accuse of error anyone who persists in lending credence to a traditional precept about whose disavowal the jurists of the two schools of analogy and tradition are unanimous. Thus they ascribe error to the Rawāfiḍ for maintaining the *Muḥ'a*⁵, whose permissibility has been annulled.

¹ It is one of the punishments for adultery, see below.

² The word u is missing in MS.

³ Acc. to the Orthodox law the stolen object must comply with the following two requirements before the thief's hand is to be cut off. It must have a minimum value and must have been stolen from a well-guarded storage-place. See Sachau, 810—11, 825—31, and Arabic, 26.

⁴ With MS. u; Ed. u.

⁵ Muḥ'a refers to two practices both of which have been abolished by the Sunnites, while the Shi'ites adhere to them. One is concerned with the Pilgrimage; in that case Muḥ'a means the utilization of the 'Umra for the Hajj.

'Umra is a pious visit which a Muslim can make to Mecca during any part of the year. The Hajj or Pilgrimage is preferably to be made in the month of Dhu-l-Hijja and entails many more observances and prescriptions. Utilization (Ar. Tamattu') is defined by Snouck Hurgronje in Het Mekkaansche Fest (Verspreide Geschriften, 1, 57) as follows: In that case (i. e. utilization), although intending to perform the Hajj, the Iḥrām is taken on before an 'Umra which is accomplished during the Hajj-months. The person afterwards remains in Mecca, enjoys the same freedom as the Meccan inhabitants, and takes on the Iḥrām again on the first Hajj-day (the 8th of Dhu-l-Hijja). Although traditions agree in reporting that Muḥammad himself utilized this arrangement and allowed others to do so, 'Omar nevertheless forbade it. See ib. 57ff. See also Wansink's article in El, II, s. v. Hajj, esp. 456b; Jurnbol,

The Orthodox are agreed that God imposed upon mankind the duty of knowing Him, and enjoined them regarding it and that He bade them know His Messenger and His Book and perform whatever the Book and Tradition guide them to do. They declare as infidels any of the Kadariyya or the Rawāfiḍ who maintain that no one was charged by God with the duty of knowing Him, as Thunāna¹, al-Jahiz², and a group of the Rawāfiḍ believe. They agree that as regards any acquired speculative knowledge, it is possible for God to turn us into possessors of a necessary knowledge of the fact known. They declare as Kāfir any of the Muḥazila who maintain that our knowledge of God in the Future World will be acquired and not necessary. They agree that the sources of the precepts of the Law are the Kur'ān, the Sunna and consensus of opinion among the Ancients³. They call a heretic anyone of the Rawāfiḍ who believes that the Kur'ān and Sunna possess no validity at the present time, owing to their charge that the Companions altered parts of the Kur'ān and mistranscribed others⁴. They declare as infidels the Khawārij, who reject all the traditions which the transmitters have handed down, because they contend that those who transmitted them are infidels. They declare al-Nazzām a Kāfir because he denies the validity of consensus and of unbroken tradition, and because of his opinion that it is possible for the community to agree on an error, and that it is possible that the members of a Tawāṭur-tradition have agreed to establish a falsehood.

This is an exposition of the theses of the first essential on which the Orthodox are agreed.

146—8. For the Shi'ites the Muḥ'a is not only allowed but even prescribed. Hilli in his Muhtalaf, 90, 109, says: الْحَجُّ فَرِيضَةٌ عَلَى كُلِّ مُسْلِمٍ. He also quotes a tradition which states: أَلِمْ لَكَ (40 miles) ذِكْرًا لَكَ وَارْجُلًا لَكَ وَارْجُلًا لَكَ. Cf. Strothmann, Kallus d. Zaidien, 69—70. The other case of Muḥ'a is in marriage where a man takes a woman for a specified period, and the union is automatically dissolved when the period is over. This practice was also abrogated by 'Omar. Vorlesungen, 228—9.

¹ Ed. 157 (Seeley, 177).

² He teaches that all knowledge "is an activity in which man has no choice", Ed., 160, (Seeley, 181). Therefore he also argues that only those who have God's knowledge as a necessary part of their nature will believe in Him while the others are not required to do so.

³ Usūl, 17—20. In that work, Kiyās is also included as a source.

⁴ Cf. Koranauslegung, 270 sqq.

Regarding the second essential, which is the proposition relating to the creation of the Universe, it has been agreed that by Universe we mean everything which is not God¹. Everything which is other than God and His eternal attributes is created and made; but its Maker is neither created nor made, nor is He of the species of the Universe or of the species of any part in the Universe. They are also agreed that the component parts of the Universe fall into two divisions: substances and accidents², contrary to the teachings of those who deny accidents³. They agree that every substance consists of an indivisible atom, and declare al-Nazzām and the philosophers to be infidels because they teach the divisibility of every atom into parts ad infinitum⁴. This would force us to conclude that its parts are not limited in God's knowledge. But this conclusion involves a rejection of His Word: "and He records the number of all things"⁵. They declare themselves for a firm belief in the existence of angels, jinn and devils as part of the various kinds of living beings in the Universe⁶. They condemn as infidels the philosophers or Bāṭiniyya⁷ who disavow them. They teach the homogeneity of substances and bodies⁸ and explain: Verily their differences in form, color, and odor are due only to the diversity of the accidents which exist in them. They accuse of error all those who say that bodies differ because of the differences in their elements⁹. Similarly they ascribe error to those philosophers who profess that there are five elements, maintaining, as Aristotle did, that the heaven is a

¹ Usūl, 33; Creencia, 59.

² See Maimonides, Guide, part I, Ch. 73, prop. VIII, (Munk, I, 398).

³ Usūl, 36—7. Among those who deny the existence of accidents it lists Abu Belr al-Aṣamm and the Materialists. It also offers the Kalamistic proofs for their existence.

⁴ Ed., 123—4 (Seelye, 144—5); Usūl, 36 with a logical refutation of al-Nazzām's theory; Ash'ari, 314—8.

⁵ Sura 72, v. 28.

⁶ Acc. to Usūl, 38 there are two classes of living beings, one which we perceive in our present life and another which we may see in the future world. Besides the three mentioned here he counts the "black-eyed maidens" (Sura 55, v. 72).

⁷ Ed., 280 (above 135).

⁸ For the various views on this problem see Usūl, 52—4. The proof of the Orthodox point of view will be found 54. See also Rāḍi, 5 top; Ash'ari 308.

⁹ This is the view of the اصحاب الجاهل, Usūl, 53.

fifth element which is not susceptible of becoming and perishing¹. They accuse of error all the Dualists who assert: Verily, bodies are of two kinds, light and darkness. The source of all good is the light and the source of all evil is the dark. The Maker of the good and the true cannot make the evil and the false; nor can the Author of the evil and false produce the good and true². We questioned them³ regarding the status of a person who says: I am evil and darkness. Who is the one who makes this statement? If they say he is light, then he told a lie; and if they say he is darkness, then he told the truth. In this we find the destruction of their thesis that light does not tell a lie nor does darkness tell the truth, which is a necessary conclusion for them in view of their principle. We, however, do not establish light and darkness as two primary Makers. For we say: Verily both of them are created and are not agents.

The Orthodox are unanimous regarding the diversity of accidents, and they declare al-Nazzām an infidel for his view that all accidents are of one type⁴, all, in fact, being motion. This would compel him to admit that belief is in one class with non-belief, knowledge with ignorance, and speech with silence, and that deeds of the Prophet are of the same species as the actions of the accused devil. It behooves him, in consequence of this principle, not to be angry with anyone who curses or reviles him, because the word of him who says: May God curse al-Nazzām, is in his opinion in the same class with the wish: May God be gracious to him⁵.

They agree that the accidents are brought into existence in the bodies, and condemn as infidels the Materialists who believe that they are concealed in the bodies and that anyone of them appears only when its opposite becomes concealed

¹ Shahr, 318.

² See Usūl, 53—4 where he subdivides the Dualists into three groups: Manichæans, Dualistæ, and Marcionites. Cf. Shahr. 188—96, where, in addition to the three listed by Usūl, he discusses the Mazdakīya (see above 87, note 2,3); If, I, 35—6 (Ash, I, c., 130—1) enumerates the three as in Usūl.

³ The following question is ascribed to al-Nazzām in his discussion with the Manichæans, Intisāf, 30.

⁴ Ed., 121—2 (Seelye, 143); for a list of the errors inherent in this view see Usūl, 48.

⁵ This refutation is repeated almost verbatim Ed., ib., and Usūl, 48.

in its subject¹. They all share the opinion that every property is created in a bearer and that the property does not exist independently². They declare as infidels the Muʿtazila of Basra who believe in the creation of the Will of God not in a bearer, far be it from Him³! And those who believe in the creation of the act-of-extinction of bodies independently of its subject. They declare Abu Hudhail a Kāfir because of his teaching that God's saying to a thing: Be! is an accident created not in the subject⁴. They consent commonly that bodies are not devoid, and never were devoid, of the accidents which follow one another in them⁵. They declare as Kāfirs the upholders of the Hylic hypothesis who maintain that the hylic matter existed primordially stripped of accidents; then the accidents came to be, with the result that it assumed the present form of the Universe⁶. This view is the apex of absurdity, because the inherence of a property in a substance brings about a change in its quality but does not cause an increase in its quantity. If then the hylic matter of the world had been one substance it would not have been converted into many substances as a result of the inherence of the accidents in it.

They are agreed that the earth is stationary and still⁷ and that its motion really results from an occurrence which befalls it, such as a quake or something similar. This runs counter to the view of the Materialists who maintain that the earth swoops downward⁸ through the air perpetually, for, if it were so, it would ¹ The extent to which al-Nazzām in his philosophy is a disciple of the pre-Socratic philosophers and their views on Kunūʾin are well described by Horten in his study in ZDMG, LXIII (1909), 774—92. For a refutation of al-Nazzām see Uṣūl, 55—6.

² See Maimonides, ib., Prop. V; IH, I, 14 bottom.

³ Uṣūl, 103; Ashʿarī, 189—91 (he lists five views of the Muʿtazila on Will); Creencia, 168 and 171—2, where the Muʿtazilite theory is combated. See below under the fourth essential.

⁴ Ed., 108—9 (Seelye, 131; her trans. fails to render the original correctly); Ashʿarī, ib., and 363.

⁵ Uṣūl, 56. The expression "that follow one another" is in accordance with the Kalamistic view that all accidents have a momentary existence and are constantly replaced by new ones. See Maimonides, ib., Prop. VI.

⁶ Uṣūl, 57, where the contention is refuted as in our text; Creencia, 63 ff.

⁷ Uṣūl, 60 ff. where several attempts to account for the earth's firmness are listed. Cf. Ashʿarī, 326.

⁸ Uṣūl, 319—20; Albīrūnī, 189.

necessarily follow that a stone which we hurl with our hands should never overtake the earth, because a light object cannot overtake a heavier one in its descent. They agree that the limits of the earth are finite in all directions¹ and similarly the periphery of the skies is finite in its six directions. This is in contradiction to the opinion of the Materialists who think that the earth is not limited below, on the right, on the left, behind, or in front, and that it is finite only in the direction where it is contiguous to the air above it². They also think that the sky is finite only in its downward direction but is infinite on its five sides other than the lower one. The refutation of their contention is obvious in view of the return of the sun to its rising point every day and its circuit of the orb of the sky and what is above the earth in the course of a day and a night. But the crossing of limitless distances, through set places, in a limited time is not possible.

They agree that the heavens are seven in number and are superimposed on each other, contrary to the opinion of those among the philosophers and astronomers who think that they are nine in number³. They also agree that they are not spherical bodies revolving about the earth, contrary to the contention of those who maintain that they are spheres, one within the hollow of the other, and that the earth is in their midst as the center of the sphere is in its inside. Whoever professes this belief cannot recognize a throne above the heavens, nor angels nor anything of that which the Monotheists⁴ recognize as existing above the heavens. They further agree that the annihilation of the entire world, considered as something within His ability⁵ and capacity, is admissible. But they believe in the eternal⁶ existence of Paradise and its pleasures and in the perpetuation of Hell and its tortures as in a divine ordinance⁷. They also regard the annihilation of certain bodies and not others as possible. They declare Abu Hudhail

¹ Uṣūl, 61—2 and 66.

² This opinion is refuted Uṣūl, 62 lines 10—15.

³ Uṣūl, 64—5. Cf. the long discussion regarding the sphericity of the earth, the heavens, God's throne, etc. in IH, II, 97—105, esp. to 101.

⁴ With MS. الوحدانية; Ed., الوحدانية.

⁵ With MS. القدرة; Ed., القدرة.

⁶ With MS., القدرة and below; Ed., القدرة.

⁷ IH, IV, 83 ff., esp. 85—6; Uṣūl, 238; Ashʿarī, 164.

an infidel for his belief in the interruptions of the pleasure of Paradise and the tortures of Hell¹. They declare those of the Jahmiyya as Kāfirs who predict the extinction of Paradise and Hell². They declare al-Jubbāi and his son Abū Ḥāshim to be Kāfirs because of their assertion that God cannot decree the extinction of some bodies while allowing others to survive, but that He can decree the destruction of all of them by an act-of-destruction which he may create not in a subject³.

Regarding the third essential, which is the doctrine dealing with the Maker of the Universe and His essential attributes which it views as compatible with His essence, they teach that all things created have undoubtedly a Creator and Maker⁴. They declare Thumāmā and his followers among the Kādariyya to be heretics because of their view that generated acts have no Author⁵. They state that the Maker of the Universe is the Creator of bodies and accidents, declaring Mu'ammār and his followers among the Kādariyya infidels because of their contention that God created no accidents, for He created only the bodies and it is the bodies which generate the properties in themselves⁶. They profess that the originated things were before their beginning neither entities nor ideas nor substances nor accidents, contrary to the view of the Kādariyya that the non-existents are entities during their state of non-existence⁷. The disciples of the Basra School among them maintain that substances and accidents were substances and accidents

¹ Ed., 104—5 (Seelye, 127—8); IH, ib.; Ash'ari, 163.

² Ed., 199 (above, 13); IH, ib.; Uṣūl, ib.

³ Ed., 183—4 (Seelye, 204—5).

⁴ The starting point of the Mutakallims for all proofs of the existence of God, — later criticized by the Aristotelians, — is that the world is created, as has been established by our author in the second essential. (For more detailed proofs see IH, I, 9—21, esp. 14ff. (Asin Palacios, II, 94—109); cf. also the proofs of the Jewish Mutakallims, as e. g. Sa'adia and the adequate summary in Maimonides, Guide, I, chap. 74). Once the world is proved to be existent in time the demonstration of the existence of a Maker generally follows the same line as in our text, see Uṣūl, 68—9; IH, I, 21—3 (Asin, 109—113). The most philosophic proof, still contingent on "a world which comes into being", will be found Creencia, 59—73.

⁵ Ed., 157—8 (Seelye, 178); Ash'ari, 407. Cf. IH, V, 59—60.

⁶ Ed., 96 (Seelye, 118); Ash'ari, 303; Shahr, 46.

⁷ Uṣūl, 70—1. This view is discussed and refuted by IH, V, 42ff.

before their beginning. The view of these people leads to a belief in the eternity of the World¹, and a view which leads to non-belief constitutes non-belief.

They state that the Maker of the Universe is eternal and pre-existent², contrary to the assertion and belief of the Magians in two Makers, one of whom, Satan, is created; and contrary to the opinion of Ghulāt among the Rawāfiq who teach that 'Alī, a created and originated body, became a God and an originator, thanks to the dwelling of the spirit of God within him³, far be God from their assertion. They affirm the denial of any limit or definition to the Maker of the universe⁴, contrary to the opinion of Hishām ibn al-Hakam al-Rāfi'i that the Object of his Worship measures seven spans by his own spans⁵, and contrary to the view of the Karrāmiyya who think that he is limited in the direction which is contiguous to the throne, but has no limit in the five other directions⁶. They agree that it is absurd to describe Him as possessing form and limbs⁷, contrary to the opinion of those of the Ghulāt among the Rawāfiq and of the followers of Daūd al-Jawāribi⁸ who maintain that He has a human form. Hishām ibn Salīm al-Jawāliqi and his followers among the Rawāfiq even thought that the Object of their Worship is formed in the image of a human, that He has black hair on His head and He is a black light; His upper half is hollow but His lower half is solid⁹. [Their view] also contradicts the claim of the Muḡfirīyya among the Rawāfiq that the organs of their Worshipped One resemble in shape the letters of the alphabet. Far be God from this!

They are also agreed that no place can contain Him and that He is not

¹ A variant in Uṣūl, 71 reads: As though they secretly believed in the pre-existence of the Universe but did not dare to publish it; so they professed what leads to it.

² Uṣūl, 71—2; Creencia, 74.

³ See the chapter on the Huṭūfiyya, Ed., 241—50 (above, 73—86); Rāzi, 18—20.

⁴ Uṣūl, 73; Creencia, 85—96; Rāzi, 20—1 and Tusī's note, ib. 21—2; IH, 12—3.

⁵ Ed., 215—6 (above 32—4).

⁶ Ed., 203 (above 19).

⁷ Uṣūl, 73—6.

⁸ Ed. and MS. Ḥawāri; see above 34 note 1. Acc. to Ash'ari, 153, al-Jawāribi is the one who divided God's body into an upper hollow half and a lower solid one.

⁹ Ed., 216 (above 33).

subject to time¹, contrary to the opinion of the Hishāmīyya² and the Karāmīyya who think that He is congeneric to His Throne. Indeed 'Alī, the Prince of the Faithful, has explained: God created His Throne as a manifestation of His power, not as a place for His essence. He said further: He already existed while no place existed yet, and He persists at present the same as He existed formerly³. They are unanimous in disavowing His experience of misfortunes and grievances, sufferings and pleasures⁴ and in denying to Him motion or rest⁵, contrary to the statement of the Hishāmīyya among the Rawāfiḍ regarding the admissibility of motion to Him and their claim that His place is an act of creation resulting from His motion; contrary to the opinion of anyone who allows to Him the possibility of fatigue and repose, sorrow, joy and boredom as is reported in the name of Abu Shur'ab the Pious⁶, far be God from this! They are agreed that God is independent of His creatures and does not obtain through His creatures any benefit for Himself nor does He reel through them any harm away from Himself. This is contrary to the contention of the Magians that God created the angels in order to defend Himself, with their aid⁷, against the molestation of Satan and his assistants.

They also agree that the Maker of the World is one⁸ contrary to the belief

¹ Usūl, 76-8; IH, II, 172-3; HIII, sect. 83-90.

² With MS.; Ed., 2:1-2; see Ed., 47 ff. (Seeley, 67 ff.).

³ This "tradition" is cited in Browne, A Year Amongst the Persians (1893), p. 124.

⁴ Usūl, 79-81, where he explains an array of Kūrānic passages as well as traditions which seem to support the claim that He is subject to these. For the proof of the Orthodox standpoint see Rāzi, 25-7 and HIII, 32-3 (sect. 91-3).

⁵ IH, II, 119-20; Creencia, 79.

⁶ "He was an anthropomorphist who taught that his Lord has a human form, flesh and blood, and that He rejoices and grieves, ails and recovers". Lisān al-Mizān, VI, 394 on the authority of Ibn Hāzīm. He calls him al-Ballāl. Cf. in answer to Abu Shur'ab's teachings, Creencia, 180-1.

⁷ Usūl, 82. Our author also includes the Kadariyyes there as opposed to the Orthodox view, since they claim that God created men in order that they express their thanks to Him.

⁸ Usūl, 83-7, esp. 85-6; Creencia, 126-34 (133-4 are in answer to those who believe in a good and evil God); IH, I, 34-48 (Asin Palacios, II, 127-49) who polemizes with all the proponents of another God; Rāzi, 73-4; HIII, sect. 103-5. The classical proof employed by all the authorities cited, as well as by Jewish and Christian philosophers, is that of the Dualists in two pre-existent Makers, one of whom is Light and the other Darkness; contrary to the belief of the Magians in two Makers one of whom, God, 322 pre-existent, is called Yazdān¹ and the other, Satan, accursed, is called Ahrimān; contrary to the opinion of the Muḥawwida among the Ghulāt Rawāfiḍ that God committed the management of the Universe to 'Alī so that he is the second creator²; contrary finally to the opinion of the Hāfiyya among the Kadariyya, followers of Ahmad ibn Hāfi, who assert that God committed the management of the Universe to 'Isa ibn Maryam and now he is the second creator³. We have discussed at great length the various proofs of the Unitarians about the unity of the Maker in the Book on Religions and Dogmas.

Regarding the fourth essential, which is the doctrine bearing on the attributes which are of God's essence, they teach that God's Knowledge, Power, Life, Will, Hearing, Seeing and Word are eternal attributes and everlasting qualities in Him⁴. The Muḥawwida have indeed divested Him of all the eternal attributes⁵, saying: He possesses neither Power nor Knowledge nor Life, nor Vision, nor means of perceiv-of mutual obstruction: if they are identical, unity is implicit; if one is inferior to the other, the doctrine becomes absurd.

¹ Ed. and MS. šy.

² Ed., 238 (above 68). There is a disagreement between the statement here and above see ib, note.

³ Ed., 2:0-1 (above 99-100).

⁴ These seven are the constant number to which all Ash'arites have bound themselves on the basis of their master's classifications; even Ghazālī and Rāzi adhere to it. It is interesting how in respect to attributes the Jewish Mutakallims part very definitely from the Arabs. Sa'adia lists only three: Life, Knowledge and Power, and Baḥya counts Existence, Unity, Eternity. For the proofs adduced by the Orthodox, see Ibāna, 54-9 (based almost entirely on final references to the Kūrānic text); Creencia, 201-13 (more philosophic); see IH's attack on the Ash'arite point of view, III, 135 ff. For his own view see ib, 130-4 (a summary in Zahiriyya, 142 ff.). It is interesting that IH does not for a moment deny that he stands on Text and not Reason, adding on page 131: "Our words are addressed to members of our religion who accept the Kūrān. As for the other religions, we do not address them because they (the proofs) are the consequences of certain traditions, and the consequence is valid only after accepting the premises".

⁵ Ed., 93-4 (Seeley 116-7); Horten, Probleme, 118 ff.; Galland, Muḥawwides, 51-67, esp. 54 ff. Cf. Vorlesungen, 106 ff.

ing the audible. They even confirm created speech in Him¹. The Muʿtazila of Baghdad have denied Will to Him. But those of Basra have recognized in Him a Will created in time, not in a substratum². But we reply: A denial of the attributes implies a denial of the Possessor³ of the attributes, just as in denying action the author is denied, and in denying speech a denial of the speaker is involved⁴. The Orthodox theologians agree that God's Power is one over all its objects and by means of it He exerts His Power over all its objects in the way of an absolutely new creation not of something acquired⁵. This is contrary to the declaration by the Karrāmiyya that God's Power extends only over the originated existences which belong to His essence⁶, but the creatures which exist in the Universe God created only by means of His Words and not by His Power. This is also contrary to what Kadarites of the School of Basra say that God—far be it from Him—exercises no control over the acts which are the objects of the free will of mankind or of the other living beings⁷. The Sunnites are agreed that the objects of God's Power will not perish, contrary to the opinion of Abu Hudhail

¹ The various Muʿtazilite views on the Kurʾān are collected in Ashʿarī, 191—3. Cf. Gal-land, l. c., 67—75.

² Ashʿarī, 181—91 (the Baghdadīan view, 190, line 12ff); Uṣūl, 90—1. — The statement about the Muʿtazilite view of God's attributes is not entirely correct. What they denied was the existence of attributes as differing from His essence but not His actual Power or Life. That is, they denied that He possesses life as something with which His essence is qualified but they granted for the most part that His essence means Life, Knowledge, etc. See Ashʿarī, 164ff. and Rāzi, 61. One may of course deduce from this that they actually deny attributes, so in Ibāna, 54—5.

³ Reading وجوه with MS.; Ed., *وجوه*¹.

⁴ Uṣūl, 90—3; Ashʿarī ib.

⁵ What he means is that every act performed by man is directly created by God and not indirectly by virtue of the fact that God created man. See Creencia, 152, note 1.

⁶ Ibn Karrām's views on God's Power are explained Ed., 208 (above 24). Acc. to Uṣūl, 93, he classified all the possible accidents which God can create in Himself into five categories: His configu-ity to the Throne, His Word, His Will, His perception of Hearing and His perception of Vision. See Ed., 208 (above 24).

⁷ This thesis, the chief bone of contention between Muʿtazilism and Orthodoxy, is fully developed from the Orthodox point of view and defended against Muʿtazilite criticism in Creencia, 144—56.

and his followers among the Kadarīyya that the Power of God will reach a state in which it will perish with all its objects¹ and after that He will exercise no Power over anything, nor will He at that time be Master over anyone for evil or for good. He maintained that those who dwell in Paradise and those who inhabit Hell at that moment will remain paralyzed because of the absolute immobility of their essence². Far be God from their opinion! Al-Aswārī and his followers among the Muʿtazila maintain that God possesses Power to do only that which He knew He would do, but that which He knew He would not do or which it was announced in His name that He would not do, He possesses no Power to do³. Far be God from this⁴!

The orthodox are agreed that God's attribute of knowledge is one, and with it He knows all its objects in detail, unaided by perception, intuition or inference⁵. Muʿammār and his followers among the Kadarīyya hold that it cannot be said of ¹ Ed., 102—3 (Seeley, 125—6); Uṣūl, 94; Ashʿarī, 163. Intisār, 8—9, denies this to have been Abu Hudhail's teaching and also disavows the charge that he believed in a stagnation of Paradise (page 127; he attributes this belief to Jahm), adding the rather significant and telling remark: "he repented of this doctrine and its proof before his death".

² See above 181; Uṣūl, ib.

³ See the interesting report of a discussion on this matter among the leading Muʿtazilites, Ed., 183ff. (Seeley, 206ff.); Ashʿarī, 2—3. Cf. also Horten, Systeme, 245ff.

⁴ The contention of Aswārī which is really difficult to set aside Ghazālī answers in a highly philosophic manner by distinguishing between God's Power as unrelated to His Knowledge which is, of course, not weakened by His Knowledge that the thing cannot happen, and between His Power in relation to His Knowledge which are mutually exclusive and hence impossible. Creencia, 141—4. The same reconciliation is made Intisār, 20—1. Acc. to Ashʿarī, 203, 'Alī al-Aswārī himself admitted that when unrelated to each other the two were possible. IH, II, 183—4, also feels that either al-Aswārī's view is to be accepted, which he opposes, or only his own: that God is capable of doing everything. His proof of it is that since the question which is raised about God's ability to do the absurd is itself a creation by God, He no doubt endowed that question with a meaning.

⁵ Uṣūl, 95; Creencia, 162—3; Rāzi, 54—8. Al-Ashʿarī takes this subject of God's Knowledge as an occasion to disprove the view of those who deny attributes, Ibāna, 54—9. See, however, IH's criticism of his stand, II, 135—40.

God that He knows Himself¹. It is a marvel indeed that One who knows others should not know Himself. Some of the Rawāfiḍ think that God does not know the object before it comes into being². Zurāra ibn A'yūn and his followers among the Rawāfiḍ maintain that God's knowledge, Power, Life and other attributes are created in time³ and that He was neither living, nor powerful, nor knowing until He created for Himself Life, Power, Knowledge, Will, Hearing and Seeing.

They agree that his Hearing and Seeing encompass all things visible and audible and that God has beheld Himself and heard His own speech eternally⁴. This is contrary to the opinion of the Ḳadiriyya of Baghdad that God is not a Seer nor a Hearer in the real sense of the Word, and that the expression "He sees" and "He Hears" are employed merely in the sense that He knows the visible and the audible⁵; contrary also to the declaration of the Mutazila that God beholds objects other than Himself but does not behold Himself; It also contradicts the statement of al-Jubbāi regarding the distinction between the hearer (السَّمِيعُ) and the hearing⁶ (السَّامِعُ), between the beholder (البَصِيرُ) and the beholding (البَصَرُ), so that he could declare that He has eternally been a hearer and a beholder (سَامِعًا وَلَا مُبْصِرًا) but He has not eternally been hearing and beholding (سَامِعًا وَلَا مُبْصِرًا). But he may reverse this distinction and yet not discover any difference as a result of its reversal⁷. The orthodox are agreed that God will be visible to the

¹ Ed., 141 (Seelye, 161); Creencia, 162; Uṣūl, ib. Cf. Intisār, 53, where al-Khayyāt attempts to deny this.

² Rāzi, 56; Cf. Ash'ari, 138 ff. Ibn Rawwāt accused the Mutazilite Hishām al-Fuwayḍ of maintaining the same attitude, but al-Khayyāt in denying this accusation claims that he confused him with Hishām b. al-Hakam, Intisār, 60.

³ Ed., 52 (Seelye, 71-2); Ash'ari, 36; Shahr., 142. Cf. Intisār, 5-6 and 8.

⁴ Creencia, 176-81; Uṣūl, 96-8; Rāzi, 48-9; Ibāna, 47-54. In answer to al-Ash'ari, cf. II, 140 ff., esp. 141-2.

⁵ Ash'ari, 173-4 and 183-5; II, 143.

⁶ Meaning that He eternally possessed the attribute of Hearing but was not a Hearer until there were audible things in the world. Uṣūl, 96; Ash'ari, 176-7. This view, however, is unorthodox in the light of the Ḳur'ānic verse لا يَمْلِكُ الْبَصَرُ (Sura 20, v. 48). Cf. II, 144, and Creencia, 177 (Ghazālī's adherence to text and tradition is much more evident in his discussion of these attributes than elsewhere).

⁷ The same criticism is leveled against him, Uṣūl, 96-7.

faithful in the world to come. They declare: That He may be¹ visible in any state and to every living being can be rationally proved; and His appearance that He will certainly appear to the faithful in particular in the world to come is established by Tradition². This is contrary to the opinion of those of the Ḳadiriyya and Jahmiyya who consider His visibility impossible³; contrary to the opinion of those who maintain that He will be discerned in the world to come with a sixth sense, as Dīrār ibn 'Amr was inclined to think⁴; and contrary to the opinion of those who maintain that the non-believers will also see Him as Ibn Sālim al-Basri believed⁵. We have already discussed the propositions regarding vision in detail in a special work⁶.

The orthodox are agreed that the will of God is His Desire and free choice⁷ and that His desire for something means His aversion for the lack of it, just as they believe that when He prescribes something he prohibits the neglect of it. They say further: Verily His Will realizes all its objects in accordance with His knowledge of them⁸. He wills the coming-into-existence of things simultaneously with the time when He knows they will come into being. Whatever He knows

¹ Reading يَكُونُ with MS; Ed. يَكُونُ.

² See both the rational and the traditional proofs, Uṣūl, 98-102, Creencia, 110-26, where substantially the same arguments, although more philosophically, as in Uṣūl are employed. (Ghazālī utilizes the example of the mirror to prove that a definite direction or place is not required for vision). See Ibāna, 13-23 with the Ḳur'ānic verses as the starting point (Cf. Suyūṭī, Durar al-Hisn, 25). It is interesting that the authorities (Uṣūl, 99; Creencia, 122 ff.; Ibāna, 15) all employ as an example Moses who asked for a vision of God, arguing that Moses would not have made the request if he knew that it could not be. Cf. Vorlesungen, 105.

³ Ash'ari, 153 and 213-7.

⁴ Ed., 201 (Above 16-17); Ash'ari, 216 and 282.

⁵ See on him ZDMG, LXI, (1907), 77-8.

⁶ Perhaps it is his Kitāb al-Ṣifāt, Subt., iii, 239.

⁷ It is surprising that, in discussing the attribute of Will, Baghdādī does not list the dissenting opinions. For a discussion and a refutation of them, see Uṣūl, 102-5; Creencia, 165-75; Ibāna, 60-7; Rāzi, 42-8; Hili, 22-4, II, following his literalism and principle that names of God cannot be derived, grants that God wills because there is textual proof for it, but sees no place for attributing a will to Him or for calling Him willing. II, 176-7.

⁸ The Will thus becomes a determining principle, which cannot be said of Power or Knowledge. See Creencia, 173; Rāzi, 42 ff.

will not come into existence, He wills that it should not become. They say: Nothing is created in the Universe save through the mediation of His Will; what He wishes comes into being and what he does not wish is not originated¹. The Kadariyya of Basra believe that God wishes what does not come and that existences have come which He has not wished. But this opinion leads to the belief that God is coerced and compelled to create what He loathes to create². Far be God from this!

The Sunnites are agreed that the Life of God is without the medium of a soul³ or of nourishment, and that all spirits are created, contrary to the assertion of the Christians about the pre-existence of a Father, a Son and a Holy Ghost. They are further agreed that Life is a pre-requisite to His Knowledge, Power, Will, Vision and Hearing, and that if one is not alive one cannot credibly be knowing, powerful, willing, hearing and seeing⁴, contrary to the opinion of al-Sālihi and his followers among the Kadariyya that the existence of knowledge, power, vision and will in a dead person is possible⁵.

They agree that God's Speech is an eternal attribute of His⁶, and that it is neither created-in-time nor brought-into-being, contrary to the contention of the Kadariites that God created His Speech in some body⁷; contrary to the opinion of ¹ This tenet is directed against the Mu'tazilites who deny that God wills evil. The discussion is developed Ibāna, 63—4; Creencia, 174—5.

² Ibāna, 61—2.

³ Uṣūl, 105, explains that life is an eternal attribute and soul a substance.

⁴ Uṣūl, 105—6; Creencia, 164; Rāzī, 41; Hili, 21—2. IH attacks the Ash'arite view, II, 153ff., esp. 155ff.

⁵ Horta, Systeme, 306, who attributes this view to Sālihi, uses our author as his source.

⁶ Uṣūl, 106—8. Ghazālī, agreeing with the Ash'arite doctrine, solves all the difficulties connected with it by distinguishing between the actual sounds and letters which, of course, are temporal and between what he calls "verbum mentis" (Ar. ḡawḡ, ḡawḡ), a something intermediate between the sounds and the ideas in the sounds. It should not therefore be confused with the Will or the Knowledge or the Power behind the words. Creencia, 182—99. IH, II, 4—15, repudiates both the Mu'tazilite and the Ash'arite view, (the latter for the same reason as all the other attributes), and maintains the literal interpretation of the uncreated character of the Qur'ān, granting only that the voice which pronounced the words to Muḥammad was created. The Ash'arite view is also rejected Hili, 26—8. Cf. Vorlesungen, 109—13.

⁷ Creencia, 184. Acc. to Ibāna, 26 passim (except 32 where he attributes the view to Kadariites as well) this is Jahm's doctrine and he accuses him of aping the Christian theory the Karāmīyya that His Speech is an originated entity in His Essence¹; contrary 326 to the assertion of Abu Hūdhaīl that His saying to something: Be! has no substratum but that the remainder of His Speech is created in bodies². We maintain that it cannot be admitted that His Speech originated in Him in time because He is not the subject of created objects; nor that it originated outside of His Essence because that would force us to the conclusion that one other than He speaks, bids, and forbids³ with it; nor that it originated independently because an attribute cannot exist in itself. The creation-in-time therefore becomes untenable and it is true that His attribute is eternal in Him.

They say regarding the fifth essential, which is the doctrine bearing on God's names and qualities⁴, that the way to find God's names is to determine them from the Qur'ān, reliable traditions, or by consensus of the community. But it is not allowed to apply a name to Him from inference⁵. This is contrary to the view of the Mu'tazila of Basra about sanctioning the application of names to Him by inference⁶. Indeed, al-Jubbāi went so far in this matter that he named about the Logos in Mary's womb. But in Ash'ari, 191—3, he correctly attributes the teachings about a created Qur'ān — whether as an accident or a substance — to Mu'tazilites in general. Cf. also 582—92 esp. 589 ff. and IH, II, 5. See a discussion of the Mu'tazilite view in Goldziher's article, Islam, III (1912), 245—7.

¹ Ed., 206f. (above 23f).

² Ed., 108—9 (Seeley, 131—2); Islam, II, 246.

³ Uṣūl, 106—7; Ibāna, 26—33 where he at the same time proves his own doctrine.

See Hili's attack on the Ash'arites and his defence of the Mu'tazilite attitude, 27—8.

⁴ Arab.: ḡawḡ. Although Ash'ari identifies the significance of this word with Ṣifāt, Baghdādī explains the latter as the attribute of any object from the standpoint of the object, and a Wasf as the attribute from the standpoint of the speaker, Uṣūl, 115.

⁵ Acc. to Uṣūl, 115—6, the reason is that a slave cannot confer a name on his master, nor a son on his father. Lawāmi' al-Bayyina, 52, quotes Abu Khalaīf ibn 'Abd-al-Malik al-Sulami's work on God's names to the effect that God fixed the names at ninety-nine instead of hundred in order to show that they must be determined and not inferred.

⁶ Uṣūl, 116; Fakhr-al-Dīn Rāzī, Lawāmi' al-Bayyina, 18. Abu Bakr al-Bāḡiānī also agrees with this view, ib. See also Rāzī, 81—2. (Ṭūsī, ib., points out that that is not the Orthodox attitude). Ghazālī distinguishes between attributes and names, restricting the latter only to those mentioned in the text, while permitting a free use of qualifying attributes. Cre-

God Obedient-to-His-creature when He grants Him what he seeks, and he named Him Impregnator-of-women since He causes pregnancy in them¹. But the community declared him in error for this impudence, which will bring suffering to him². The Orthodox say: True tradition has it that God is known by ninety-nine names and that he who comprehends³ them enters Paradise. By comprehending them we do not mean the count of their number and an explanation of them. The non-believer, too, may recite them by way of giving an account of them, yet he is not among those destined to enter Paradise. By comprehending them are meant a realization of what is contained in them and a belief in their implicit meaning⁴. This is confirmed by the usage: "So-and-so is a man of comprehension and self-possession", if he is a person of knowledge and understanding⁵. They say: God's names fall into three divisions⁶. One refers to His Essence such as the One, the Self-sufficient, the first and the last, the Great, the Perfect, and the other descriptions of His Essence which are rightly proper to Him. The second division

¹ Ed., 168 (Seelye, 188); Ash'ari, 194—5.

² هذه الجسارة التي تورثه الجسارة : Arabic : A Sajr in Arabic.

³ This tradition is reported in the name of Abu Huraira, Bukhari, IV, 450 (trans. Houtsma, IV, 583), Muslim, V, 269–90. It is neither universally accepted nor unanimously interpreted. Cf. Lawāmiʿ al-Bayḥaqi, 49 who reports that Abu Zaʿid al-Balkhi doubted its authenticity, Ghazālī, in reporting that Ibn Ḥazm only listed some eighty names, explains it on the ground that the latter either did not know the tradition or held it apocryphal, Creencia, ib. Nawāwī, in his commentary to Muslim, ib., raises no doubt as to its authenticity but explains that the number ninety-nine is not exclusive and others may be added; but it is these claims that the number ninety-nine is not exclusive and others may be added; but it is these ninety-nine which bring one to Paradise. This interpretation is the one that Lawāmiʿ, 50, ninety-nine which bring one to Paradise. This interpretation is the one that Lawāmiʿ, 50, also accepts. — The number ninety-nine instead of one hundred is generally explained on the ground that God prefers the odd to the even, Creencia, ib.; Lawāmiʿ, 53.

⁴ Bukhari, ib., interprets the Arab. verb: ʾatlaḥ ʾal-ḥaṣ. Nawāwī, ib., who cites several interpretations also agrees with Bukhārī. Lawāʾim, 56—7, cites four interpretations: counting, fixing it in the mind, ability to preserve the sacredness of the names, and, finally, tracing the source and implication of the names.

⁵ Reading with Brockelmann, Monde Oriental, XIX (1925), 199. MS. and Ed., إسلامة. Lisan al-Arab, s. v. explains: قوله على دراي .

⁶ Usūl, 121–6; Lawāmi, 22 bottom ff., esp. 24 bottom f.; Circencia, 447–8.

gives an idea of His eternal attributes which are inherent in His Essence. Such are: the Living, the Powerful, the Knowing, the Willing, the Hearing, the Seeing, and the other descriptions derived from the attributes which are inherent in His Essence. God is eternally qualified both by this group of names and by the group discussed above. Both of them are of His eternal attributes. The third division is derived from His acts, such as the Creator, the Bestower, the¹ Just, etc. By all names derived from His acts He is not qualified before the coming-into-existence of His acts². There are some among His names which have a double meaning³: one of them an eternal attribute and the other an act of His. For example, the Wise; if we apply it in the sense of wisdom which is identical with His Knowledge it is one of His eternal names. But if we apply it because of the wisdom and stability of His acts, it is derived from His acts and is not one of His eternal descriptions.

They teach regarding the sixth essential, which is the thesis of God's justice and Wisdom — far be He from any imperfection, — that God is the creator of bodies and accidents, the good and the evil alike. He is the creator of the acquired acts⁴ of mankind and there is no creator other than God⁵. This is contrary to the belief of those Kadariites who hold that God created none of

¹ MS. has an illegible word here beg. ...ly. Cf. Usul, 126, top

³ This is contrary to the view of the Karrāmiyya that God was eternally a Creator and Bestower. Ed., 206 (above 23); Uṣūl, 122.

³ Usui, 126—7.

* Arab. قوله . In Usul, 133—4, Baghādāt gives the following definition of Al-shay' al-muṭlaq. Let us suppose a heavy rock which one man is not capable of carrying while another is. If both should carry it jointly, the achievement is due to the more powerful one, yet at the same time the weaker one is not excluded from being a carrier. In the same way man alone cannot perform his acts; if God should choose to be alone in executing what will be man's act, He possesses power to do it, so that it would be the object of His Power. Its existence is therefore due to God's Power, yet at the same time the acquirer (Mutlaq) is not excluded from being author of the act.

⁶ Usūl, 134–7; Creencia, 144–56 for a discussion and refutation of the Mu'tazilite view. (It is significant that he has no quarrel here with the Jahariyyes; cf. indeed Rāzī's evaluation of Ash'ari's view, 74); Isārah, 67–71. For the discussion of the subject see Vol'stun-gin, 82–92, 98–100; Rāzī, 74–7.

the acquired deeds of humanity¹; and contrary to the view of the Jalmiyya that man neither acquires, nor has he power over, his deeds². Whoever maintains that man creates his own works is a Kadarite entertaining polytheistic notions of his Lord in view of his assertion that in the spheres of knowledge, will, voices and sounds, men create accidents, such as movements and rests, similar to God's creation. In condemnation of the adherents to this view God has made the statement: "Or have they set up with Allah associates who have created creations like His so that what is created became confused to them? Say: Allah is the creator of all things and He is the One, the Supreme"³. But if one maintains that man has no control over his acts and that he is neither a doer⁴ nor an acquirer, then he is a Jabarite. Balanced Justice⁵ excludes both the principle of Jabar⁶ and the principle of Kadar. He, therefore, who asserts that man acquires his acts, yet God is the creator of his acquired act, is a Sunni with a balanced sense of justice, keeping away from both Jabar and Kadar.

The Orthodox concur in rejecting the views of those who uphold the theory that man performs a certain act in himself from which an effect results in something other than himself⁷. This is contrary to the view of the majority of the ¹ Ash'ari, 199ff. and 227-42; Uṣūl, ib.; Creencia, ib.; Ḥill, 42-4; Iḥ, III, 25-6. Iḥ assumes an intermediate position between the various views by recognizing for every act a double "istiḥāḍ": one which is a sort of pre-disposition, e. g., sanity of organs and removal of hindrances, which precedes the act, and another, the power from God to effect the act, which is simultaneous with the act, 26-35.

² See the refutation of the Jabarites, Iḥ, III, 22 bottom-25 bottom; Ed., 199 (above 13); Uṣūl, ib.

³ Sura 13, v. 17.

⁴ Reading ḥāḍ with MS.; Ed., ḥāḍ.

⁵ Arab. 'Adl, doubtless chosen by Baghdādī because of the fondness of the Mu'tazila for the term and the latter's use of the name ḥāḍ (people who assert wrong-doing) as a nick-name for their opponents. Maitūrdī, 4.

⁶ Both Ed. and MS. read ḥāḍ, which is meaningless.

⁷ Uṣūl, 137-9; Maimonides, Guide, I, ch. 73, Prop. VI. This, of course, is a denial of cause and effect. Iḥ, in line with his views on Ikhtiyāḍ, contends in connection with this problem that both views are right. The effect is God's creation, but since man has volition, the apparent relation of an act to a living being is true. In the case of an inanimate agent without choice there is of course no performance of the act by him, V, 59-60.

Kadariyya that man performs deeds effecting other things which result from causes which he generated within himself¹, and contrary to the opinion of those of the Kadariyya who think that the secondary actions are effects which have no author, as Thumama was inclined to think². They agree that the performance by acquisition of acts of motion, rest, will, speech, knowledge, thought and whatever else follows the line of these accidents which we have mentioned, may be predicated of man, but that the production of colors, tastes, smells, and auditory percepts cannot be predicated of him. This is contrary to the opinion of Bishr ibn al-Mur-tamar and his followers among the Mu'tazila that man produces colors, tastes and smells in the manner of effects³. They [i. e. Bishr and his adherents] also hold that even the inducing of vision in the eye and of auditory perception in the organ of hearing is predicable of man⁴. More abominable than this is the assertion of Mu'ammār⁵ the Kadariite that God did not create any of the accidents and that they are all effects produced by the bodies. There is shame in plenty for him in this error.

The Orthodox say: God's guidance manifests itself in two ways⁶: one, by giving clear expression to the truth, summoning people to it and establishing proofs for it. From this standpoint, it is right to associate guidance with the apostles and with everyone who calls people to the religion of God, because they point out to people, who are hidden to obey God, the right path to Him. This ¹ For the various Mu'tazilite doctrines see Ash'ari, 400-15. Baghdādī taunts them that in accordance with their doctrine it cannot even be proved that God formed the heavens or that He moves the stars: These occurrences may be due to the action of angels or jinns, Uṣūl, 140.

² Ash'ari, 407; Ed., 157-8 (Seelye, 178).

³ Uṣūl, 139-40; Ash'ari, 403; Ed., 143 (Seelye, 163).

⁴ Uṣūl, ib.

⁵ Ed., 136-7 (Seelye, 157-8); Ash'ari, 405-6.

⁶ For the following discussion of the types of guidance, see Uṣūl, 140-2; Iḥ, III, 43-6. Al-Ash'ari does not distinguish between the two kinds of Ḥudā (guidance), insisting instead that the Ḥur'an is for believers only, Ḥudā, 78-80; he allows, however, a call or dā'ia to the general public, ib. 81. For his interpretation of Sura 41, v. 16 which is one of the chief reasons for the Orthodox predication of a general Ḥudā (cf. Baiḍāwī, II, 221), see ib. 83-4. For Iḥ's refutation, see III, 45-6.

is the meaning of the word of God to His Messenger: "And most surely you show the way to the right path", that is, you summon people to it. The second way in which God's guidance of His worshippers is manifested is by inducing in their hearts a willingness to be guided, as He has expressed it in His Word: "Therefore whosoever Allah intends that He should guide him aright, He expands his breast for Islam, and whosoever He intends that He should cause him to err, He makes his breast strait and narrow"². Over this sort of guidance no one has any power except God. The first guidance which comes from God is extended to all who have been bidden to obey, but the second guidance which is sent by Him is limited³ to those who have been predisposed to it. To confirm this, the Word of God has been revealed: "and Allah invites to the abode of peace and guides whom He pleases into the right path"⁴. Misguiding, according to the doctrine of the Orthodox, comes from God in the sense that error is injected into the hearts of those who fall into it⁵, as He says: "And of whosoever He pleases that He should cause him to err, He makes his breast strait and narrow". They say: Whenever God causes one to err, He does it as an act of justice, and whenever He guides one, he does it as an act of grace. This is contrary to the view of the Kādariyya that guidance comes from God in the sense that He points out the right way and calls to truth but that no guidance of heart can be attributed to Him⁶. They [the Kādariyya] hold that leading astray is attributable to him in two ways: one is in naming, that is, by calling the error misguidance, and the other in the sense of punishing people who err for their error. Now, if what they said were true, it would necessarily follow that the Prophet⁷ led non-believers astray because he called them misguided; it would

¹ Sura 42, v. 52.

² Sura 6, v. 125.

³ Reading with MS. لَا يَهْدِيهِ; Ed., لَا يَهْدِيهِ. Cf. Usul, 140, lines 14—5.

⁴ Sura 10, v. 26. "In the generalization of the Call, and the limitation of guidance by desire, lies the proof that the matter is not dependent on man's will, and that he who perseveres in error does so because God does not will his going on the right path." Baḡḡawī, I, 413, line 6—7; cf. Ibāna, 81.

⁵ For the discussion of misleading (ṭalāṭ), see Usul, ib.; III, III, 46—51; Ibāna, 81.

⁶ Ash'ari, 259—62; Usul, ib.; Ibāna, ib. III, ib.

⁷ Add وَاللَّهُ and read يَا with MS. Ed. يَا; see Usul, 141, last line.

similarly follow that Ibrīs led the believing prophets astray because he named them erring¹. They would also be compelled to admit that one who inflicts punishment on adulterers, thieves and apostates misguides them because he has punished them for their error. This is wrong and what leads to it is like it.

The Orthodox teach regarding the ordained span of life (āṭal) that everyone who dies, whether naturally or by slaying, dies at the appointed time which God designated as the end of his life. God has the power to prolong his life for a certain period of time, but if he has not prolonged it that period by which his life has not been prolonged is not his appointed end. In the same way, the woman whom he does not² marry before his death does not become his wife even though God has the power to allow him to marry her before his death. This is contrary to the opinion of those among the Kādariyya who maintain that when a person is slain his life has been cut, and contrary to the opinion of those among them who hold that he who is killed cannot be called dead³; these deny the import of God's word: "Every soul shall taste of death"⁴. This is an innovation which al-Kāḍi followed, and there is enough shame for him in it.

The orthodox explain the problem of the means of sustenance on the basis of the actual state⁵. Everyone who eats or drinks something receives his sustenance, be it lawfully or unlawfully, contrary to the opinion of those of the Kādariyya who

¹ See al-Ash'ari's refutation from the linguistic angle, Ibāna, 80—1.

² This word is missing in both Ed. and MS., but see Usul, 142, lines 14—5 where the analogy with God's power to add life is expressed more clearly: "and as the woman whom he does not marry before his death does not become his wife although she could have become his wife had he not died". The example is taken from the Mu'tazilite argument that a man's span of life if he dies prematurely is to be measured by God's knowledge of who would be his wife. Ibāna, 76.

³ Usul, 143. The view is said to be al-Kāḍi's and so also Ed., 167 (Seeley, 187). But see Ash'ari, 421—4 where the Mu'tazilite views of slaying are recorded anonymously. The explanation of this thesis is that death comes from God whereas slaying is the effect of a human act. The Orthodox who deny cause and effect reply that man dies by God's act and the slaying is an accident in the slayer.

⁴ Sura 3, v. 182.

⁵ I. e. considering merely whom it is sustaining, regardless of where it comes from or by what method it was procured.

maintain that man may sometimes enjoy the sustenance provided for another person¹.

They say concerning the inception of the charge imposed on man (Takīf) that if God had not bidden His creatures to obey Him in any way it would still be an act of justice by Him², contrary to the opinion of those among the Kadariyya who maintain that if He had not charged them He would not have been just³. They assert that if He added to the task of His creatures over what He had imposed upon them, or if He reduced from the charge laid upon them, — both of these could be possible, contrary to the opinion of those among the Kadariyya who reject it⁴. Similarly if He had not produced creation, it could not be concluded that He therefore committed an outrage against justice⁵. The preferable state in accordance with His knowledge in that case would be that He should not create. They declare: If God had created the inanimate objects and not animal life, that too would be admissible, contrary to the opinion among those of the Kadariyya who say that if He had not created the living world He would not be wise. They say: If God had brought all of His creatures forth in Paradise, that would be an act of grace on His part, contrary to the opinion of those among ¹ The discussion hinges on the question of a person who steals food or marries a forbidden relation. According to the Mu'tazilite doctrine that God can do no wrong, the food procured in this way, or the wife taken against the law, cannot be the gift of God. The Orthodox, denying cause and effect, see no relation between the illegal act — which is a sin, — and the growth of the body or the happiness which are boons from God. See Uṣūl, 144—5; Aṣṭ'ari, 257, and esp. Ibāna, 76—8 where he polemizes with the Kadariites and wards off their attacks. II, III, 86—7 cannot agree with the *Aṣṭ'ari*tes to the full extent: God has nowhere said that He gives man the illegal wife. Nor can the Mu'tazilite view be accepted. He therefore argues that while God is the source of the acts, man is the real author of sin and that we are tested by these facts which are illegal.

² The pivot of the problem is whether God is free to do as He pleases or not. To the Orthodox who affirm God's freedom above all, it is therefore necessary to preface the discussion of Takīf with a clear statement of God's will and freedom. Cf. Uṣūl, 145—9; Creencia, 264—8; Raḍi, 79.

³ Aṣṭ'ari, 252—3; Hilli 45—50; II, I, 69 (Asin, 183).

⁴ Uṣūl, 149—50; Aṣṭ'ari, 246—8 esp. 247 and 249—50.

⁵ Uṣūl, 150—1.

the Kadariyya who maintain that if He had done it, He would not be wise¹. This according to them is forbidden to God. But we cannot see anything unlawful to Him; nay, we say: To Him belongs the right to order and forbid and to Him belongs the judgment. He does what He desires and rules as He wishes².

Regarding the seventh essential, — the regulations bearing on prophecy and apostolism, — they aver the veracity of messengers from God to His creatures³, contrary to the opinion of the Barāḥima who disacknowledge them despite their belief in the Unity of the Maker⁴. Concerning the distinction between messenger and prophet, they teach that every one on whom a revelation has descended from God, spoken by one of His angels⁵ and who is confirmed by some miracles which run counter to the ordinary course of affairs is a prophet. He in whom this attribute has been realized and who is further distinguished by a new dispensation or by the abrogation⁶ of part of the precepts of a law which existed before him is a messenger⁷. They say that there were numerous prophets⁸ but the messengers are three hundred and thirteen in number. The first is the Father of all flesh, Adam, and the last one is Muḥammad, contrary to the assertion of the Magians that the father of all mankind is Geyōmart⁹ who is surnamed

¹ Aṣṭ'ari, 248—9.

² Baghdādī's list of questions coming under 'Adl is much abridged. For a fuller discussion, see Creencia, 245—302; II, III, 97—142 and, from the Mu'tazilite point of view, Hilli, 40—53.

³ To the *Aṣṭ'ari*tes prophecy is a favor from God being "merely possible, neither necessary nor impossible". Creencia, 293f. Acc. to the Mu'tazilites God is obliged to send prophets since it is His duty to guide men for their advantage. Cf. Hilli, 54—6.

⁴ They believe that a man is led by his sense and intellect to obey laws. See Uṣūl, 154—5. In refutation of the Barāḥima view see, II, I, 69—70 (Asin, II, 182—5); Creencia, 293—300.

⁵ Acc. to Maurīdī, 26, it means an angel other than Gabriel; the latter reveals to apostles.

⁶ Reading ṭ with MS.; B, ṭ—ṭ.

⁷ Uṣūl, 154.

⁸ Acc. to Uṣūl, 157, true tradition records 124,000. On the manner of their creation, see Ḥayyī ul-Kulūb, 5.

⁹ With Brockelmann, I, c, 199, MS. and Ed. ج. For the Iranian legend of this first man, possibly conceived (definitely in later literature) as a prototype of man, see Christensen, Les Types du Premier Homme et Premier Roi, 11—63. The Islamic sources are collected and discussed ib., 64—101. Cf. also Uṣūl, 159 and Jusṭi, Iṣṭi, Namāh, 108b.

Ġiṣhār¹, and contrary to their belief that the last² of the messengers is Zarādusht; contrary also the opinion of the Khurramiyya who think that messengers will succeed one another endlessly³.

They profess a belief in the prophecy of Moses in his age, contrary to those of the Barāhima and the Mānawīyya who disbelieve in Him, the latter nevertheless accepting Ġsa⁴. They recognize the prophetic character of Ġsa, contrary to the opinion of the Barāhima and Jews who deny him⁵. But they deny the crucifixion of Ġsa and affirm his ascension to heaven. They say that he will come down to earth after the appearance of the Antichrist, slay the Antichrist, kill the swine, and pour out all intoxicating drink⁶; in his prayer he will face the Ka'ba and will confirm the law of Muḥammad. He will bring to life those to whom the Kur'ān granted life and he will kill everyone for whom the Kur'ān decreed death. They approve of considering a heretic everyone who falsely claims to be a prophet, whether he lived before the days of Islām, like Zarādusht, Yūdāsaf⁷,

¹ Meaning clay-king. Christensen, l. c., 27, 72 et passim. Among Muḥammadans his laḳat is sometimes Garsha (king of the mountain). Cf. ib. 68—75. Uṣūl, 159 translates it into Arabic.

² With Goldziher and Uṣūl, 159 line 7; MS. and Ed. أخرا. Uṣūl does not accuse the Magians of this.

³ Uṣūl, 158; Ash'arī, 438.

⁴ Uṣūl, 160; Jesus plays a very important role in the Manichean doctrine. See Burkitt, Manichæes, 37—43.

⁵ See his polemic with the Jews, Uṣūl, 150—1.

⁶ This last detail is not mentioned in the traditions regarding Jesus' appearance, collected in Wansinck, 113. The most common version is that "he will appear as a righteous judge, break the cross, kill the swine, dispense with the tax on infidels; wealth will be so abundant that no one will seek it (e.g. Burkitt, II, 40; Houdas, II, 51). Ibn Maǧā, Sunan, II, 269 who lists all that Jesus will do on that day, citing especially his new function as a Muslim, does not mention the incident of the wine. A detailed description of the sedition of the antichrist is found in Suyūṭī, al-Durr al-Hisān, 12.

⁷ A name very early perverted from Budasaf (cf. Hommel, VII. Oriental Congress, Semitic Section, 116—7), hero of the very famous collection of stories entitled Barlaam and Joasaph. Our author no doubt means Buddha described in Arabic sources as a Ṣābian prophet. See Murūṭī, II, 111—2 and IV, 44—5; Albirūnī, 186—9.

Māni¹, Daiṣān², Marcion³, and Mazdak⁴, or like Musailima⁵, Saijāh⁶, al-Aswad al-Anṣī⁷, and later Yazīd⁸ and the others after them who falsely claimed prophecy. They condemn as an infidel anyone who claims divinity for the prophets, and prophetic or divine character for the Imāms of the succession⁹ such as the Sabābiyya, the Bayāniyya, the Muḡniyya, the Khaṭiābiyya and everyone who pursues their path. They think it right to attribute greater excellence to the prophets than to the angels¹⁰, contrary to the teachings of al-Ḥusain ibn al-Faḍl as well as of the majority of the Kadarīyya that the angels are of greater excellence than the prophets¹¹. They believe that the prophets rank higher than the saints in the communities¹² of the prophets, contrary to the opinion of those who maintain that among the saints there are some of higher excellence than the prophets¹³. They teach the immunity of prophets from sin¹⁴ and account for those lapses which tradition re-

¹ Shaḥr, 188—192.

² ib., 194—5.

³ Contra Ed. and MS. جدي. ib., 195—6.

⁴ ib., 192—4; above 87.

⁵ The following prophets all arose during the period of apostasy following Muḥammad's death. On Musailima see IA, II, 274—81; Tab. (Zotenberg) II, 276—98; Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 16—19.

⁶ Daughter of Ḥārith, of the Tamimites, IA, II, 268—72; Tab. (Zotenberg) II, 257—69; Wellhausen, l. c., 12—15.

⁷ His real name was 'Athana b. Ka'b, IA, II, 254—9; Tab. (Zotenberg), II, 230—7; EI, I, 502—3; Wellhausen, l. c., 31—7. MS. and Ed. read عزير عزير عزير; al-Anṣī is misplaced probably through confusion with Unaisa, father of Yazīd.

⁸ That the reference is to b. Unaisa (Ed. 263 above 103—4) becomes apparent from Uṣūl, 162, line 9 ff.

⁹ Referring to the Shi'ite Imāms who are alleged by them to be the Khalīfs of Islām.

¹⁰ Uṣūl, 295—6; Ash'arī, 439—40; Rāzi, 89—90.

¹¹ Ash'arī, 48; IH agrees with them. The order according to him is: angels, apostles, prophets, and Companions of the Prophet, V, 20—2. Other groups also ranked angels above Prophets, Andraze, Person Muhammeds, 360—61.

¹² Arab. reads here عزير which is not clear to me. The translation is conjectural.

¹³ Uṣūl, 167, states definitely that the Karrāmiyya took this stand; Ash'arī, 47 ascribes the view to the Rawāfiṭ. See Skizzen, I, 34, where the reference is probably to Sāḥis; cf. II, 13 line 10 ff.

¹⁴ Uṣūl, 167—9; Rāzi 88—9; Ḥilli, 58—9. The latter states that the Ash'arites allowed minor sins; this is also the standpoint of Majrīdī, 26, who holds the view himself and main-ports about them by explaining that those were committed before they were elevated to prophecy¹. This is contrary to the opinion of those who consider minor sins admissible to them² and contrary to the opinion of the Hishamiyya among the Rawā'id who consider sinning possible to them although they profess the Imam's immunity from sin³.

Regarding the eighth essential relating to prophetic miracles and saintly wonders, they teach that a miracle⁴ is a state of things which breaks in upon the ordinary course, brought about by a claimant of prophecy and coupled with a challenge⁵ to his people to emulate him and with failure on their part to compete with him⁶, so that it will testify to his veracity during the period when God's charge to man is in force⁷. They say: The prophet doubtless performs one miracle which will indicate his truthfulness. When one miracle which points to his veracity has been manifested to him and they are incapable of vying with him, the proof which obligates them to believe and to obey him becomes binding upon them. If they demand another miracle of him, the matter is up to God⁸; if He wills, He aids him in it, and if He desires, He chastises those who tains that the distinction made by some between a minor sin and a lapse is merely verbal but that essentially they mean the same. Abu Ḥanifa also agrees with our author, 22, and so also IH, IV, 2—3. Indeed he goes into a lengthy investigation in the following sections to prove that wherever the Kūrān or tradition report anything in blame of the prophets it is not within the category of sin. Contrary to his usual literalism, Ibn Ḥazm is obliged to employ some hair-splitting distinctions not easily separable from the Ta'wīl to which he is always so averse.

¹ Uṣūl, 168; against this view Ḥilli, 59—60. Cf. Goldziher's article in Islam, III (1912), 238—45.

² The Mu'tazilites allow minor sins, Ash'ari, 226—7; Maturīdī ib. But see Andrae, Person Muhammads, 140 ff.

³ Ash'ari, 48.

⁴ For the definition see Uṣūl, 170—1; Ḥilli, 56—7 and especially Ḥi 175—78. Cf. Andrae, Person Muhammads, 101—3.

⁵ Creencia, 296—7; IH, who says that he read this requirement as a distinction between prophet and saint or magician in Bāḡhān's work, rejects it summarily, V, 2—3 and 7—8, and IV, 317. See Andrae, l.c., 115.

⁶ Uṣūl, 171.

⁷ This statement is meant to exclude the miracle on the Day of the Resurrection, Uṣūl, 170.

⁸ Uṣūl, 173.

demanded the miracle of him, since they failed to put faith in one, the proof of whose truthfulness had already been made manifest¹. This is contrary to the opinion of the Kādariyya who think that the prophet requires no greater miracles than the soundness of his law², as Thumāmā believed³. They declare: When one makes honest claims to being a prophet, it is possible for him to perform a confirmatory miracle⁴, but the appearance of a miracle in confirmation of a claimant who falsely⁵ arrogates prophecy to himself is not admissible. But it is possible for a miracle to occur which will demonstrate his falsehood⁶, like the speech of the tree or of one of his limbs, giving him the lie⁷.

They say: the appearance of wonders to saints is possible, and they establish them as proofs of their veracity with respect to their states just as the miracles of the prophets are evidence for the justness of their claim⁸. They assert that the duty rests on the performer of the miracle to make it manifest and to challenge others, but the performer of wonders challenges no one else and generally keeps them secret. The miracle worker is assured of the outcome, but the wonder-man is not secure against a reversal of the event⁹. Thus the outcome to Balaam¹⁰ son of Bā'ūra was reversed after the manifestation of his

¹ Traditions from the life of Muḥammad illustrating this principle are collected in Ḥayāt al-Kulūb, 112—20.

² See our author's objections to it, Uṣūl, 176; cf. Creencia, 295.

³ Uṣūl, 175—6 where he also lists the Ibādīyya and Karrāmiyya among those who deny the pre-requisite of a miracle (cf. Kashf al-Maḥjūb, 219). In the several accounts of Thumāmā's heresies this one is not recorded.

⁴ For the distinctions of where and when prophecy may occur, see Uṣūl, 173—4; Creencia, 297—9. For the Mu'tazilite denial of it see, Ḥilli, 58.

⁵ Reading كاذب with MS., missing in Ed.

⁶ See 'Alī Ṭabarī, Al-Dīn wal-Dawla (ed. Mungana), 14 (trans. 11 bottom). Ghazālī denies the possibilities of any miracle occurring through the mediation of a liar. Creencia, 301—2. These incidents are probably culled from the experiences of some false prophet, but I have not been able to trace them.

⁷ Uṣūl, 174—5; Creencia, 300—1. IH denies the possibility of working wonders since the time of the Companions for whom there is written evidence, V, 10—1.

⁸ Uṣūl, 175; Kashf al-Maḥjūb, 220 sqq.

¹⁰ Cf. the Biblical account, Numbers, XXXII—XXXIV.

335 wonders. The Kadariyya disacknowledge the wonders of saints because they have not found anyone in their sect worthy of showing a wonder¹.

They profess the miraculous character of the Kur'ān manifest in its composition², contrary to the view of those of the Kadariyya who think that there is no inimitable excellence in the poetic style of the Kur'ān, as al-Nazzām was inclined to believe³. As regards Muhammad's miracles, they confess their belief in the cleaving of the moon, making the pebbles utter praises in his hand, the flowing of water from between his fingers, his feeding many people with little food, and many others similar to them. But al-Nazzām and his followers among the Kadariyya dissent from this.

Regarding the ninth essential, relating to the pillars of the law of Islam, they teach: Verily, Islam is erected on five fundamentals: the confession that there is no God except Allah and that Muhammad is the Apostle of Allah; the recitation of prayers; the contribution of alms; the fast of Ramadān; and the pilgrimage to the Holy House. They rule that anyone who rejects the obligatoriness of any of these five fundamentals or allegorizes them to mean a patronization of certain people, as the Mansuriyya and the Jarāniyya among the Ghulāt Rawāfiḍ interpret them, is an infidel. They teach that the prescribed prayers are five in number⁴. They declare anyone who abandons the obligation of any of them to be a heretic. Musallima the Liar cancelled the need of the morning and evening prayers, making of their cancellation a wedding-gift to his wife Sajāh who put forth a false claim to prophecy; he thus became an infidel and a de famator¹. They recognize the obligatory character of the Friday prayer² and condemn as Kāfir those among the Khawārij and the Rawāfiḍ who rule that there is no Friday gathering at present until the re-appearance of the Imām whom they are expecting³.

They recognize the duty of the poor-rate from the choicest items, such as gold and silver, camels, kine and sheep⁴, provided these three species of domestic animals graze at large⁵. They require it from nutritive soil-products which people sow and later use for food⁶. They require it from palm-dates and grapes. Whoever maintains that there is no compulsory poor-rate on these listed products is a Kāfir. But one who confirms the general principle of the compulsory poor-rate, and whose disapproval of the rates is in line with the differences of opinion among jurists, is not a heretic. They accept the compulsory nature of the fast of Ramadān and forbid breaking it during that period except for reasons of minority of age, or being possessed, or sickness, or traveling, or a similar reason⁷. They declare that the observance of the month of fasting commences with the observation of the new moon of Ramadān or with the completion of thirty days in Shaḥbān⁸. They cannot break it at the end of the month except upon observation of the new moon of Shawwāl or the expiration of thirty days in the month of Ramadān. They accuse of error those among the Rawāfiḍ who commence their fast one day before the appearance of the new moon and break it one day before the right time⁹.

¹ The account of the wedding-gift is found in Tab. I, 1917—19, repeated almost verbatim in A, II, 270—1.

² The evidence from the Kur'ān and the traditions is cited in Umm, I, 167. Cf. Juynboll, 85—9, and Uṣūl, 190.

³ Query, Droit Musulman, I, 85; Uṣūl, ib.

⁴ Uṣūl, 191.

⁵ i.e., if they were not sent to work and grazed on free land which did not cost the owner anything. Juynboll, 100—2.

⁶ ib., 99—100.

⁷ ib., 121—2.

⁸ ib., 117—9.

⁹ Query, l.c., I, 195.

¹ Uṣūl, 175. The bite in this statement is all too obvious. The Kadariites deny these miracles because in their view it would impugn the claim of the Prophet.

² Uṣūl, 183—4; Ḥill, 57; Greencia, 309—13. Uṣūl, ib., and Bāklānī, Ḥizā al-Kur'ān, 18—27 esp. 18—20 add to this inimitability also the content of many mysteries in the Book which none can equal, and the perfect knowledge of history since the beginning of time displayed in this Book which was revealed by a man who did not know how to write and who read only with difficulty.

³ Uṣūl, 184; Ash'arī, 225—6. Most Mu'tazilites agree with the Orthodox. The accusation against al-Nazzām is also found in Intisār, 27—8; al-Khayyālī denies it.

⁴ Umm, I, 59—60; Mudawwana, I, 55—7; Juynboll, 66—71.

They affirm the obligation of the pilgrimage and¹ the pious visit at least once upon everyone who is able to perform it². They condemn those among the Bāṭiniyya who reject the obligatory nature of both³ as infidels, but they do not declare him a heretic who denies the need of making a pious visit, owing to the differences of opinion in the Community regarding its compulsory character⁴.

They teach that among the conditions required in order to make prayer valid, are to be reckoned the purification, the covering of the pudenda, the arrival of the right time, and facing the Kibla wherever possible⁵. Whoever fails to comply with these requirements or part of them, despite his ability to fulfill them, is an infidel.

They recognize the obligation of the Holy War against the enemies of Islām until they become Muslims or until the poll-tax is paid by those among them from whom the acceptance of tribute is permitted⁶. They affirm the legality of trade⁷ and the illegality of usury⁸. They declare everyone who legalizes usury generally to be in error⁹. They rule that sexual intercourse is not allowed save by lawful marriage or rightful concubinage. They condemn the Muḥayyida¹⁰, the Muḥammira and the Khurramiyya as infidels because they rule adultery lawful. They also declare those people Kāfir who interpret the forbidden relations to refer to persons whom they think it forbidden to befriend¹¹. They confirm the obligation to inflict punishment for adultery, theft¹², wine and libelling¹³ and they

¹ Reading ḥajj, with Casanova; MS. and Ed. ḥajj.

² Sura 3, v. 91.

³ Reading ḥajj; MS. and Ed. ḥajj.

⁴ Ed., 280.

⁵ Uṣūl, 193 where the general requirements for the other fundamentals are also listed. Cf. Juybol, 61—4, 68, 75.

⁶ Uṣūl, 194; Juybol, 336—44, and below, under the fifteenth essential.

⁷ Uṣūl, ib.; Juybol, 261—3; Sachau, 271 and 275—9.

⁸ Uṣūl, 195; Juybol, 270—6; Sachau, 271 and 279—81.

⁹ Acc. to Uṣūl, ib., he is a Kāfir. Cf. Juybol, 270 and Sachau 279.

¹⁰ With Goldziner; Ed. and MS. ḥajj. On the group see above.

¹¹ Referring to the Bāṭiniyya and some ultra-Shi'ite sects.

¹² These crimes, to which may also be added highway-robbery, are discussed fully in Juybol, 300—6; Sachau, 809—12 and 815—37; Uṣūl, 197—9.

¹³ It is limited to false charges of adultery. Juybol, 303—4.

declare those among the Khawārij who reject the punishment for wine¹ and stoning² to be heretics. They state that the sources of the precepts of the law are the Book, Tradition, and consensus among the ancients³. They declare anyone a heretic who does not regard the consensus of opinion among the Companions as evidence. They condemn the Khawārij as Kāfirs for their rejection of the authority of consensus and tradition, and they declare anyone among the Rawāfiḍ a Kāfir who says that none of this serves as evidence because authority rests with the Imām whom they are expecting. These people are at present bewildered in their straying, and there is sufficient shame for them in this.

Regarding the tenth essential which is devoted to what is allowed and forbidden, they teach that the acts of the Mukallafs (those bidden to obey) fall under five categories: the obligatory, the forbidden, the commendable, the improper, and the allowed⁴. The obligatory is that which the Lord has commanded as a binding necessity. Whoever neglects it, incurs just punishment on himself for neglecting it. The forbidden is that which God has interdicted and its doer brings due punishment upon himself for doing it. The commendable is that for the performance of which one is rewarded but for whose neglect one is not punished. The improper is that for the avoidance of which one is rewarded but for whose performance one is not punished. The allowed is that for the performance of which one is neither rewarded nor punished, nor does one suffer punishment or earn reward for neglecting it. All this concerns the acts of the Mukallafs. As for the acts of the animals, the insane, or children, they cannot be defined at all in terms of legitimate, obligatory or prohibited⁵. They assert that everything, such as knowledge of God, confession, or works, which are binding on the Mukallaf are binding only because God enjoined them upon him. Everything which it is forbidden to do is so because of God's prohibition. But if ¹ It is the Najādāt who annul this punishment, Ed., 68 (Seeley, 90).

² A punishment inflicted in certain cases of adultery, Juybol, 301—2; Sachau, 809. Among the Khawārij, the Azāriqa oppose stoning (Ed., 64, Seeley, 84).

³ Uṣūl, 204—5; Juybol, 39—54. It is to be noted that our author fails to include the fourth source, Kyās (analogy). Uṣūl, 205, discusses it.

⁴ Uṣūl, 199—200; Hitt, 40—1; Juybol, 58—61.

⁵ IH, I, 78—81 (Asin, II, 190—4).

the command or the interdiction had not come from God to His worshippers, nothing would be obligatory on them and nothing would be forbidden to them.¹ This is contrary to the opinion of those among the Bar'īna and Kadarīya who maintain that the charge is imparted to the intelligent person by two inclinations which stir in his heart.² One of them emanates from God Who exhorts him by means of it to apply reasoning and logic; the other comes from Satan who urges him through it to disobey, and prevents him thereby from following the first inclination. This forces them to the conclusion that Satan was also a Mukallaf by two inclinations³ one of which emanated from God and the other from another Satan. Thereupon the argument regarding the second Satan will be like that about the first, so that an infinite series of Satans will be premised. But this is absurd, and what leads to absurdity is in itself absurd.

Regarding the eleventh essential, which deals with the extinction of mankind and their judgments in the world to come, they teach that God can annihilate the entire world summarily or destroy part of the bodies and allow the others to endure.⁴ This is contrary to the opinion of those among the Kadarīya of Basra who hold that He is capable of destroying all bodies with an accident-of-perishing not in a substratum which He will create,⁵ but that He is unable to destroy some of the bodies while others continue to exist.

They assert that God will finally resurrect all mankind and the other living beings who died in the world,⁶ contrary to the view of those who maintain that He will resurrect only people but not the remaining living beings. They affirm the creation of Paradise and Hell contrary to the belief of those who think that

¹ Uṣūl, 202-3; Creencia, 284-92; IH, I, 72-73 (Asin, I, 161-4).

² Uṣūl, 203-4; Creencia, ib. and 295; IH, I, 69-70 (Asin, II, 182-5). The two inclinations are of course very similar to the دو نوا and دو نوا in Rabbanic theology.

³ Satan in Arabic theology is a rebel angel who disobeyed, therefore the argument is applied here. Uṣūl, 204, adds that if they do not think him a rebel against orders he is not to be condemned.

⁴ Uṣūl, 229-30; for further information see above 232-3 and notes.

⁵ See the protests of our author as an orthodox Muslim against this view, Uṣūl, 231-2.

⁶ Uṣūl, 236-7; Creencia, 320-3; HII, 82-3; Rāzi, 100-2; IH, IV, 79-81, where the problem is raised whether the soul will be resurrected or the body as well. He decides in favor of the latter. Cf. Uṣūl, 235-6.

they were not created.¹ They believe in the perpetual enjoyment of Paradise by its inhabitants and the perpetual sufferings in Hell of the polytheists and the hypocrites, contrary to the opinion of those like Ja'far who believe that they will both perish, and to the opinion of Abu-l-Hudhail the Kadarite that all the objects of God's power, both within these two places and elsewhere, will perish.² They say that only infidels are destined to Hell eternally, contrary to the teachings of the Kadarīya and the Khawārij that all who enter Hell will remain there eternally.³ They assert that the Kadarīya and the Khawārij will be condemned to Hell eternally and will not escape from it; how can God forgive those who declare that it is not up to God to forgive and deliver from Hell those who enter it?

They declare that they confirm the examination in the grave⁴ and the tortures in the grave for those who deserve them.⁵ They have decided that those who deny tortures in the grave will be tortured there. They believe in the Apostle's Pool⁶, the Bridge⁷ and the Balance.⁸ Whoever disacknowledges them

¹ Uṣūl, 237-8; Ash'ari, 475; Abu Hanifa, 41-2; Majma'i, 28-9; IH, IV, 81-3.

² Uṣūl, 238; Ash'ari, 474-5; Abu Hanifa, ib.; Ibn Iskander, 24; IH, IV, 83-6. The latter mentions a Shi'ite sect which believes that the people of Paradise and Hell will be created with their destinies.

³ A full summary of the various views held on eternal Hell etc., will be found IH, IV, 44-6. He himself agrees with our author. See Uṣūl, 242; Ash'ari, 274; Ibn Iskander, 22; Rāzi, 102-3.

⁴ This examination will be conducted by the two angels Nākir and Munkar. For traditions and details, see Wolff, Muk. Eschatologie, 71-3 (Arab. 40-1); Ghazālī, al-Durra, 20-3 (Arab. 23-7); Abu Hanifa, 43.

⁵ Wolff, l. c., 162-71 (Arab. 94-8); al-Durra, 24-8 (Arab. 27-32). Ghazālī argues that punishment is possible in the grave but IH, IV, 67 asserts that the examination and torture will take place on the Day of Resurrection and that until then there is no contact between the body and soul of a dead person. See also Idāna, 91-2.

⁶ Uṣūl, 246; HII, 83-4; IH, IV, 66; al-Durra, 70; Idāna, 90-1; Ash'ari, 473.

⁷ Same sources as above. For a description see Wolff, l. c. 147-54 (Arab. 82-6).

⁸ Creencia, 326-8, giving us a good insight into the realistic belief in it by a rational philosopher; HII, ib.; IH, IV, 65-6. The idea of the Balance, and probably the Bridge, is borrowed from the Persians who share it with the Hindus. See Goldziher, Islamisme et Parsisme, RHR, XLIII (1901), 11-2. For the Persian doctrines see A. V. W. Jackson's article on the Persian belief in the future life in Sneath, Religion and the Future Life, 126-199.

will be forbidden to drink from the Pool and his foot will slip from the Bridge to the fire of Gehenna. They affirm the Intercession¹ of the Prophet and the pious people of the community in behalf of Muslim sinners and of whosoever had in his heart a speck of faith. But those who deny Intercession will have it denied to them².

Regarding the twelfth essential relating to the Caliphate and the Imāmate³, they teach that the Imāmate is a duty incumbent on the community, because the appointment of an Imām establishes⁴ judges and executives. He guards their frontiers, leads their armies in raids, apportions the booty among them, and vindicates the one wronged against the wrong-doer⁵. They say that the method of conferring the Imāmate on the Imām in this community is selection, by seeking the most qualified person⁶. They say there was no indication from the Prophet regarding the appointment of anyone in particular to the Imāmate⁷, contrary to ¹ Uṣūl, 244-5; Iḥ, IV, 63-5; Wol't, l.c. 177-85 (Arab. 100-4); al-Durrān, 56-8 (Arab. 66-9).

² The reference is to the Kadariyya and the Khawārij who believed that Intercession would not prevail. Iḥ, ib., agrees with our author in charging them with denial of it and so also Ash'ari, 474, where it is stated that some Mu'tazila denied it while others limited its efficacy only to believers. In Ibāna, 89-90, al-Ash'ari, however, argues with them not about its existence as he does in the case of the Pool and the tortures, but about whom it will be applied to.

³ In Uṣūl, Baghdādī counts this as the thirteenth essential and lists Faith (our thirteenth) as the twelfth.

⁴ Both this word "establishes" (أشهر) and the word "guards" (يحفظ) have a damma over the ya in the MS. to indicate either the passive or the IV form. Yet neither suits here. The entire phrase is doubtful and unfortunately Uṣūl's readings are also uncertain here, 271.

⁵ Uṣūl, ib., Iḥ, IV, 87; Rāzi, 105-6 (Tūsī's commentary as a Shi'ite is interesting, 110); Hilli, 62-4, maintaining the view in common with the Mu'tazila that reason as well as revelation dictate the appointment of an Imām; Creencia, 348-52; Ikhā'id, I, 388-91.

⁶ Creencia, 352-5; Uṣūl, 279.

⁷ This question of nass (indication) is the pivot of the entire conflict between Sunnites and Shi'ites. From the Orthodox point of view see Uṣūl, 279-81; Ibāna, 94 (Ash'ari maintains that there is a nass but it obviously points to Abu Bekr; the Khalifs named their successors); Iḥ, IV, 96-105, esp. 96-8 and 102 (he also recognizes a nass but merely in the Kurāish); Creencia, 352-9, and finally Streitschrift, 63-6 (Arab. 36-9). The Shi'ite

the opinion of the Rawāfi'd that he definitely indicated the Imāmate of 'Alī, in a way which is absolutely trustworthy. But if it were, as they allege, on the basis of a tradition which has been transmitted¹, others similar to it have been handed down². Whoever makes this claim regarding 'Alī in face of the want of a continuous chain of authority in its transmission, cannot be distinguished from anyone who makes a similar claim for Abu Bekr or for someone else despite the lack of traditions to support it³.

They teach that it is a condition of the Imāmate that the incumbent be a son of the Kurāish⁴, descendants of the Banu Naḍr ibn Kināna ibn Khuzāima ibn Mudrika ibn Alyās ibn Mudar ibn Nizār ibn Mā'add ibn 'Adnān⁵. This is contrary to the opinion of the Dirāriyya that the Imāmate may be held by all Arabs, or by freed slaves, or by Persians⁶, and is also contrary to the belief of the Khawārij claims are recorded in Hilli, 64-78 a very full exposition; a refutation of most of it will be found Iḥ, ib.: Strothmann, Staatsrecht d. Zaiditen, 11-25; a refutation of the Sunni argument, ib., 13-4.

¹ See two traditions (both characterized as "Mukawwihīn"—transmitted by a continuous chain—in Hilli, 75-7; Hayyāt-ul-Kulub, 335-47.

² Cf. Streitschrift, 64 (Arab. 37-8); Strothmann, l.c., 29 and note two; Iḥ, IV, 91. I read the second word "ahī" as a verb and not an accusative noun as Ed. does.

³ Uṣūl, 280. The same argument is employed Streitschrift, 64-5 (Arab. 37-8). Ghazālī answers the charge made by the Shi'ites that the Companions suppressed the tradition because of personal interests. The Shi'ite answer to the question why 'Alī swore loyalty to the other Khalifs (Ibāna, 95), that he did it because he feared to disclose his real feelings, is repudiated by Ibn Hāzim as an insult to 'Alī's courage, IV, 97.

⁴ Uṣūl, 275-6 and 7; Ash'ari, 461; Creencia, 353; Iḥ, IV, 89; Ikhā'id, I, 394-400. It is interesting to note that according to him the famous theologian al-Bāqillāni dissented from this opinion.

⁵ Uṣūl relates that some wanted to trace the Kurāishitic branch to an earlier ancestor than Naḍr so as to include themselves, 276-7. Iḥ, ib., claims that the Sunnites are agreed that the Kurāish are offspring of Fitr ibn Mālik, two generations later than Naḍr. He has this on the authority of Hishām b. Muḥammad. Cf. Tab., I, 1106; l.c., II, 18-9. Baghdādī probably carries the genealogy no further because there is a tradition that the Prophet forbade searching beyond Mā'add Murrij, IV, 118 and 119. l.c., ib., does not record this tradition, but also closes his account because of the great confusion beyond 'Adnān, 23-4.

⁶ Dīfā'i said that a Persian was even to be preferred to an Arab and a Mawla to a free man. Uṣūl, 275. Ash'ari, 462, explains that it is because they have less family protection in the Imāmate of their chiefs who sprang from the Rabi'a and other clans, such as Nāfi' ibn al-Azrak¹ al-Hanafi, Najda ibn 'Amir² al-Hanafi, 'Abdallah ibn Wahab al-Rāshid³, Hurkūš ibn Zubair al-Bajali⁴, Shabīb ibn Yazīd al-Shabānī⁵ and their like, who deviate from the saying of the Prophet: The Imāns are from the Quraysh⁶. They assert that learning, uprightness and statesmanship are pre-requisites to the Imāmate⁷. They require learning of him to the extent of qualifying as one of those who can develop legal rulings⁸ in the precepts of the law. They stipulate that he possess enough probity so that he can be included among those on the basis of whose testimony a judge may issue a decision; that is, he should be of a pious religious attitude, kindly disposed to his possessions and affairs, above committing any deadly sin, nor addicted to minor sins, and above failing in manliness under the most trying circumstances. But it is not one of the requirements that he be altogether immune from sin⁹, contrary to the opinion of the Imāmiyya who maintain that the Imām is immune from all sins¹⁰. Yet they have believed it right for him to say in case of fear¹¹: I am not an Imām, when in reality he is and IH, explains that it is because these are easier to remove. Nauhakhtū, 10, cites both reasons. Acc. to him, Mutazilites, other things being equal, preferred a Qurashite. We no doubt find here echoes of the resentment felt against the 'Umayyads. But most probably, it is due to Shi'biyya views. See Muḥa, St. I, 137. For an echo of this controversy in tradition see Mukhtalif al-Hadīth, 149-51.

¹ Ed, 62-6 (Seeve, 83-7).

² ib., 66-70 (87-91).

³ ib., 71- (92).

⁴ ib.; I read 𐤎𐤓𐤕𐤌 with MS.; Ed, 𐤎𐤓𐤕𐤌.

⁵ ib., 89-92 (111-5).

⁶ The tradition in this version is reported Tawāṣiṣi, #926 and 2133, See also Bukhārī, IV, 407; Tirmidhī, II, 36 top; Uṣūl, 276; IH, IV, 89-90.

⁷ Uṣūl, 277; Creencia, 353; Streitschrift, 82-9; Strothmann, I, c. 67-82; Ikhtald, I, 392-3. All of these include Qurashitic origin as one of the necessary qualifications.

⁸ Uṣūl, ib.; Strothmann, I, c., 70; Streitschrift, 86-9. For a full discussion of Imānād see EI, II, 448-9.

⁹ Uṣūl, 278; Streitschrift, 66 (Arab. 39-41).

¹⁰ Ḥilli, 64-8; IH, IV, 95.

¹¹ Arab. Takīyya (with Goldziher, Ed. and MS. 𐤕𐤓𐤕𐤌). It is a principle, granting one the right, and in Shi'ite circles the duty, to dissimulate, conceal one's true belief and reign the Imām. In this way they have permitted him to lie despite their belief in his freedom from lying¹.

They assert that the Imāmate is bestowed by the act of one who confers it upon a person who is eligible for it, provided the person conferring it is a qualified jurist and an upright individual². They rule that the Imāmate can rightly belong to only one person throughout the entire land of Islam³, unless a barrier lies between the provinces, such as an ocean, an enemy that cannot be coped with, when the people of the two districts are not able to lend each other aid. In that case it is legal for the people of one province to confer the Imāmate on one of their men who is qualified for it⁴.

They recognize the Imāmate of Abu Bekr the Righteous after the Prophet, contrary to the Rawāḥīd who confirm it only for 'Alī⁵, and contrary to the opinion of the Rawandīyya who confirm the Imāmate of 'Abbas after him⁶. They approve of grading Abu Bekr and 'Omar first in rank, respectively, and after them 'Alī, but adherence to the views of the ruling party in order to avoid dangers. See EI, IV, 628-9, and Goldziher's article in the ZDMG, LX (1906), 213-26. Although sometimes utilized by Sunnites, and more frequently by the Khawāṣṣ, it is essentially a Shi'ite characteristic.

¹ The Shi'ite answer will be that according to this reasoning prophets cannot be regarded immune either, since even Muḥammad dissembled. Cf. EI, ib.

² Our author follows al-Ash'arī's ruling that the choice by one qualified individual is adequate, Uṣūl, 280-1. But there are a number of other views ranging from two people to the entire Muslim community. Uṣūl, ib.; Ash'arī, 460; IH, IV, 167-71; the latter agrees with al-Ash'arī, ib. 169. In this ruling we no doubt have another example of accommodation to circumstances which characterizes the Sunnites, confronted as they were with a phenomenon of dynasties that bequeathed the Caliphate from father to son.

³ Uṣūl, 274-5; Ash'arī, 460-1 (he makes no exception for the emergency); IH, IV, 88-9 (He also does not specify any cases where the ruling may be overstepped); Ikhtald, I, 391-2.

⁴ Ikhtald, ib., specifies that this view was held by Abu Isḥāq al-Isfaranī.

⁵ One is tempted to believe that unlike his customary application of the term Rawāḥīd as synonymous with Shi'a, Baghdādī discusses in this case the Imāmiyya more particularly who, unlike the Zaidīyya, took a hostile stand to the "two Sheikhs" (i.e. Abu Bekr and 'Omar). See Friedländer's Appendix on the Rawāḥīd, Shi'ites, II, 137-59.

⁶ Uṣūl, 281 and 284-5; they are refuted by IH, IV, 91-2.

they diverge about the relative positions of 'Ali and 'Uthmān¹. They affirm their loyalty to 'Uthmān and they steer clear of anyone who calls him an infidel². They recognize the Imamate of 'Ali in its time³. They judge 'Ali rightful in his was in Basra⁴, in Šiffin⁵ and in Nahrawān⁶, and they assert that Talha and al-Zubair repented and withdrew from warfare against 'Ali⁷ but that al-Zubair was slain by 'Amr ibn Jumrūz⁸ in Wādī Sibā' after his withdrawal from the battle. When Talha was about to leave, Mervān ibn al-Hakam, who was with the Party of the Camel, shot him with an arrow and killed him⁹. They say that 'Ā'isha was aiming to set ¹ Ḥanū, 94-5; Creencia, 363-4 (his explanation that the ranking is beyond the human reason and that it is entirely within the ken of God is the struggle of an intellectual Muslim to put up with the evident lack of justice in 'Uthmān's reign, whom he ranks before 'Ali): Ash'arī, 458-9; Maturīdī, 27; Abu Ḥanīfa, 25-6. IH, IV, 112 ranks Muḥammad's wives after the Prophet and then Abu Bekr, 'Umar, 'Uthmān, 'Ali. But he determines the rank only in accordance with what the Muslims have been told of their relative position in Paradise, l. c. 111 ff. On the question of the relative rank of 'Ali and 'Uthmān cf. Ba'd wal-Ta'ribh, V, 159 and Ibn al-Jawzi, Manāẓih al-Imād b. Ḥabab, 160-61.

² Ash'arī, 454 and sources as above; Uṣūl, 286.

³ The controversy here is with the Kāmilīyya and the Khawārij. Uṣūl, 286-7; Ash'arī, 455, and sources as above.

⁴ Against the Party of the Camel, i. e. 'Ā'isha, Talha and al-Zubair. Tab. (Zotenberg) III, 632-64.

⁵ Against Mu'āwīya, l. c., 670-83.

⁶ Against the Secessionist Khawārij, l. c., 687-91.

⁷ This account is supported by the authorities. See Murūj, IV, 316-21; IA, III, 196-7 and 199-201; Tab. (Zotenberg) III, 655-60; Ya'qūbī, II, 212-3.

⁸ Ed. and MS. ḡḡḡḡ. But most scholars agree on the reading ḡḡḡḡ: Ya'qūbī II, 213; Murūj, IV, 319; IA, III, 200-1; Tab. I, 3218 (although de Goeje adds the note "Cod ut solet ḡḡḡḡ"). Tab. (Zotenberg) III, 660 reads Hornouz and so also Uṣūl, 289.

⁹ Murūj, IV, 321-2; IA, III, 196-7 and 199-200 (Acc. to him it is not certain that Mervān killed him); Tab. (Zotenberg) III, 655-60. The authorities tell nothing about Talha's intention to leave the battle. Only pseudo-Ibn Kūṭayba, al-Siyāsa wal-Imāma, 129 (On the authorship see Brockelmann, Gesch. d. arab. Lit., I, 122 and de Goeje in Rivista degli Studi Orientali, I (1907-08), 415-21) embellishes our author's account by adding that Talha exhorted God to punish the Party of the Camel in whatever way He would choose and that no sooner were the words spoken than Talha was shot by Mervān. Cf. Ibn Sa'd, v. 25, 2).

affairs right between¹ the two parties but the Banu Dabba and al-Azd overruled her opinion and fought against 'Ali without her permission, so that the succeeding events occurred². Regarding al-Šiffin they rule that right was on the side of 'Ali, while Mu'āwīya and his supporters wronged him by means of an interpretation³ as a result of which they became sinners but not heretics⁴. They declare that right was with 'Ali in the arbitration, yet the two judges did not sin by depriving him of his office, which necessitated his dismissal, and by the deception which one of the two arbiters practised against the other⁵. They assert that the party of Nahrawān deviated from true religion. The Prophet named them deviators⁶ because they condemned 'Ali, 'Uthmān, 'Ā'isha, Ibn 'Abbās, Talha, al-Zubair, and the others who followed 'Ali, after the arbitration, as infidels. They also call everyone among the Muslims who commits a sin an infidel. But whoever makes the ¹ MS. and Ed. read ḡḡḡḡ which is meaningless. The reading here is based on Uṣūl, 289, line 11 (22).

² The role 'Ā'isha played in fomenting the rebellion against 'Ali, whom she hated ever since he had urged the Prophet who suspected her chastity to divorce her, under the pretext of avenging 'Uthmān, whom she had likewise opposed, as well as her central position throughout the Battle of the Camel—actually so called because it was concentrated around her beast—are too well-known to allow anyone to so allow our author's statement unquestioningly. It is true that on the way to Basra, when she passed the place called al-Ḥawb and heard dogs barking, which recalled to her an ominous tradition of the Prophet connected with the barking of the dogs at al-Ḥawb, she wavered for a time wishing to return (but cf. Muḥ. S. II, 126). But she overcame that fear very soon and led the battle. Our author's plea that she went to make peace, told in different versions by pseudo-Ibn Kūṭayba, l. c., 125-6 and Murūj, IV, 335, is no doubt a fabrication by Sunnites. We find a sad example of her hostile tendencies in her first words to 'Ali after the battle, Tab. I, 3225. Our author's standpoint is also taken by Creencia, 361; IH, IV, 158 and Uṣūl, 289.

³ Referring to the pinning of the Kūṭān on the swords and the arrangement for the arbitration. Uṣūl, 290; IH, IV, 159-61.

⁴ ib.

⁵ Referring to the decision reached by the two judges to call for the election of a new Khalīf. But when Abu Mūsā al-Ash'arī, 'Ali's representative, openly disavowed his allegiance to 'Ali and demanded a new election, 'Amr ibn al-'Āṣī contrary to his previous agreement, reasserted the Caliphate of Mu'āwīya and carried the victory. Tab. (Zotenberg) III, 684-7.

⁶ Bukharī, II, 337.

343 Muslims Kāfirs and calls the choicest Companions Kāfirs is the one infidel among them.

Regarding the thirteenth essential relating to faith and Islām they teach: Verily the fundamental of faith is knowledge of God and an affirmation of this truth in the heart¹, but they differ regarding whether to term the confession faith, as well as the external acts of obedience, performed by the external organs, despite their unanimity as to the obligatory nature of all the prescribed commandments and the merits of performing the ordained, unwritten works². This is contrary to the doctrine of the Karāmiyya that faith is confession only, regardless of whether it is sincere or feigned³, contrary also to the opinion of those among the Kadarīya and the Khawārīj who hold that the name Believer is not applicable to sinners⁴. They (the Orthodox) teach that the term faith is not dropped as a result of any sin except heresy. He whose sin is milder than non-belief is therefore a believer even though he transgresses by his disobedience.

They say that the death-sentence on a Muslim is not legal except for one of three crimes: apostasy⁵, adultery after marriage⁶ and reprisal for a murdered person when he is his equal⁷. This is contrary to the view of the Khawārīj re-

¹ Uṣūl, 248—51. The liberal attitude of our author is surprising in view of the fact that even Abu Ḥanīfa required confession as a condition of faith. But he probably stands on the same platform as al-Ash'ari. His statement in Uṣūl, 248, that al-Ash'ari defined faith as "an affirmation of God and His Messengers and their traditions, and this affirmation is valid only if accompanied by a knowledge of Him" is contradicted by Ibāna 10, where al-Ash'ari says: "faith consists of words and deeds: it can be increased and diminished". IH, II, 111 and III, 188—9, confirms Uṣūl, ib. But the editor takes exception there to this statement, maintaining that Abu-l-Ḥasan identified faith with Islām so that any word or deed which would exclude one from Islām, automatically makes him an infidel. That this defence is weak becomes apparent from Ibāna, ib.: Islām is more inclusive than faith and not every tenet in Islām is part of faith.

² For these differences, see Uṣūl, 248—9; IH, ib.

³ Ed., 211—2; Ash'ari, 141; IH, ib.; Uṣūl, 250—1.

⁴ Uṣūl, 249—50; IH, III, 229—34; Ash'ari, 266—70.

⁵ Sachau, 812 and 843—6; see under the fifteenth essential.

⁶ Sachau, 809 and 815—7; Juyūbūl, 301—3.

⁷ Reading ḡa' with Goldziher; Ed. and MS. ḡa'. The law is that reprisal (Kiṣās) is allowed only on certain conditions among which is that the murdered one must be a Muslim if the murderer is. Juyūbūl, 294—6; Sachau, 762 and 774—6.

guarding the legitimacy of slaying everyone who is disobedient to God. If all the sinners were infidels they would become apostates from Islām. But if they had this status, it would become an obligation to kill them without inflicting any punishment on them. There would thus be no purpose in requiring the amputation of the thief's hand, or the flogging of the rebel or the stoning of a person committing adultery after marriage. The apostate receives no other punishment than execution.

Regarding the fourteenth essential, relating to Saints and Imāms, they assert that angels are immune from sin¹ by the Word of God: "They (the angels) do not disobey Allah in what He commands and do as they are commanded²". The majority of them affirm that the excellence of the prophets is greater than that of the angels, contrary to the opinion of those who attribute superiority to the angels over the prophets³. From this standpoint it would necessarily follow that the Zabaniya⁴ are superior in rank to those of the apostles who possess constancy, earnestness and patience. They believe in the superiority of the prophets to the saints of all nations contrary to the opinion of those among the Karāmiyya who rank some of the saints higher than some of the prophets⁵.

The Orthodox differ regarding the legitimacy of the tenure of the Imāmate by the less qualified of two contestants. Our Sheikh Abu-l-Ḥasan al-Ash'ari denied it, but al-Kāinisi granted it⁶. They profess love for ten of the Prophet's Companions and they rule that they are among those who have entered Paradise⁷.

¹ See IH, IV, 32—5 and his denial of the angelic nature of Hārūt and Mārūt or even Iblīs, see also Uṣūl, 296—7.

² Sura 66, v. 6.

³ Ed., 333 (above 201 and notes).

⁴ These are the angels who torment the dead in Hell.

⁵ ib.; Uṣūl, 298.

⁶ Uṣūl, 304; Ibāna, 11 and 95. The Zaidiyya and many Mu'tazilites shared his opinion. Ash'ari, 461.

⁷ The tradition which lists the ten who are admitted to Paradise is recorded by Ahmad b. Hanbal, I, 193. In another version, also on the authority of Sa'id b. Zaid, and recorded ib., 187, and Tirmidhi, 236, the Prophet is one of the ten, Abu 'Ubayda is eliminated and Sa'd ibn Mālik replaces Ibn Abi Waqqās.

These include the four Khalfis, Talha, al-Zubair, Sa'd ibn Abu Wakkās,¹ Sa'id ibn Zaid ibn 'Amr ibn Nufai', 'Abd-al-Rahmān', Abu 'Ubaida ibn al-Jarrāh.² They profess their love for all who were present with the Prophet at the battle of Badr, and are convinced that they are among the people who dwell in Paradise.³ They maintain a similar attitude to all who witnessed with him the battle of Uhud, with the exception of one man whose name is Kuzmān. He slew a number of the polytheists at Uhud, but then killed himself and was therefore classed with the hypocrites.⁴ Similarly all who were present at the Pledge of Good Will in al-Hudabiya are among the people who have entered Paradise without a reckoning and everyone of them will intercede for seventy thousand.⁵ In this group and everyone of them will intercede for seventy thousand.⁶ In this group 345 'Ukāsha ibn Mihsan is also included. They also teach us to love all who died while defending the religion of Islām, provided they were not, before their death, partisans of any heresy of the heresies of the people of erring fancies.⁷

Regarding the fifteenth essential, relative to the status of the enemies of the faith, they teach that the enemies of the faith fall under two categories. One existed before the rise of the reign of Islām, and the other sprang up since the institution of Islām. These take shelter in Islām outwardly, but they deceive the Muslims and pursue their own wickedness. Those which existed before Islām comprise a number of groups with diverse characteristics.⁸ One consists of the worshippers of idols and images. Another worships particular individuals like those ¹ A general who participated in many of the wars of expansion of Islām. EI, IV, 29—30.

² Contra Ed. and MS. which read جذ. He was a very early convert to Islām and exceedingly pious. I, c. 66—7.

³ Ibn 'Awf, a Kuraisiite and early convert to Islām, I, c. I, 54.

⁴ A close Companion of the Prophet, I, c. I, 112.

⁵ Uṣūl, 302.

⁶ Kuzmān is the man about whom the Prophet had previously remarked that he would go to Hell. After displaying great valor on the battlefield he took his own life when his wound pained him. As the Prophet heard it, he exclaimed: 'I testify that I am in truth the apostle of God. Tāh. I 1423—4; IA, II, 125; Uṣūl, 302 (the reading جذ is hardly correct).

⁷ Tirmidhi, II, 71; cf. Wensinck, 182a and 112a.

⁸ Uṣūl, 317.

⁹ See a similar list, with several divergencies, Maḳṭiḏī, 344—5; Uṣūl, 318—24.

who adore Jamshīd¹ or those who invoke Nimrud ibn Kanān² or Fir'aun and their like. Another worships all forms which it considers beautiful, in accordance with the doctrines of the Ḥalūfiyya and their claim that the Spirit of God is embodied in beautiful forms. Still another worships the sun, or the moon, or the stars as a whole, or some one star in particular.³ There is one which worships the angels and calls them Daughters of God. With respect to these people God's Word was revealed: "Most surely they who do not believe in the hereafter name the angels with female names".⁴ Another worships the rebellious Satan. Another serves the cow; others worship fire. The law relative to these worshippers of idols, people, angels, and fire is to prohibit to Muslims the eating of their meats⁵ and 347 marriage of their women.⁶ But they differ regarding the acceptance of the poll-tax from them. Al-Shāfi' rules: No poll-tax may be accepted from them; it may be taken only from the People of the Book or from those who possess what resembles a Book.⁷ But Mālik and Abu Ḥanīfa declare it lawful to take tribute from them, except that Mālik excluded the Kuraisiites⁸ from among those whereas Abu Ḥanīfa made an exception for all Arabs.⁹

Among the divisions which were infidels before the days of Islām are also included the Sufisāfiyya who deny realities; the Sumaniyya who teach the pre-existence of the world and reject inductive and deductive speculation, contending that nothing can be known except through the five senses; the Dahiriyya who believe in the eternity of the world; those who recognize an eternal hylic matter

¹ (Or Jamshīd) one of the earliest Persian kings. IA, I, 46—7, who reports that he also claimed divinity; Al-Birūnī, 200—3; Justi, Iran. Namenb., 144.

² Called by other authorities ibn Kusā. The stories about him are collected IA, I, 67—72 and 81—4.

³ The reference is to those who worshipped Saturn because he is the highest of the seven planets. Uṣūl, 321.

⁴ Sura 53, v. 28.

⁵ Umm, II, 211; cf. Juybol, 178.

⁶ Sura 2 v. 220—1; Ibn al-Humam, II, 506—9; Juybol, 221.

⁷ Umm, IV, 155—6 and 158; Heftering, Islamisches Fremdenrecht, 44. In note three he fails to include the Mālikites with the Ḥanīfites.

⁸ Muwaḥja (ed. Kazān) 146 and commentary.

⁹ Ibn Humam, IV, 371; Abu Yūsuf, Kitāb al-Kharāj (Cairo ed.), 153—4.

in the Universe, while admitting the creation of the accidents; the philosophers who profess the eternity of the Universe and disacknowledge the Maker. This is the view of Pythagoras and Cadmus¹. Among them are also the philosophers who confess in an eternal Maker, but who maintain that His acts are co-eternal with Him, and teach the co-eternity of the Maker and His Universe. This was the doctrine of Empedocles². They also include the philosophers who profess the eternity of the four elements and the four bases³; earth, water, fire and air; those who believe in the eternity of these four, as well as of the heavens and stars, maintaining that the heavens are made from a fifth element and that it is not subject to creation and annihilation either in its entirety or in part. The Muslims are agreed that they are not allowed to eat the meats and marry the women of the above groups; but they disagree as to whether to accept the poll-tax from them. Those who would take it from the idol-worshippers will also take it from them. But those who do not take it from the idol-worshippers will not accept it from them. It is this latter view which al-Shāfi'i and his followers support⁴.

Regarding the Magians they tell us that they are divided into four sects: Zarwāniyya⁵, Massīkihiyya⁶, Khuramdihiyya⁷ and Bihāfirīdhīyya⁸. The meats pre-

¹ Ed. and MS. فهرست. But cf. Fihrist, 239 and note.

² With Goldziher: MS. and Ed. عبد.

³ With Ed. عبد; MS. عبد.

⁴ Umm, IV, 158 f.; Ibn Humam, IV, 371; Usūl, 323—4.

⁵ A sect believing in Zarwān (lit., time), at first probably an abstract idea, but later a divinity from whom Ahura Mazda and Ahriman are said to have sprung. See their account in Shahr., 183—5; ERE, XI, 346; Dhalla, Zoroastrian Theology, 203—5. A longer study of them has been published by Irvin Blum in Studies in honor of Dastur Darab Pecholian Sanjāna, (1925), 61—81.

⁶ Ed. عبد; MS. عبد for عبد; Shahr., 185, عبد. These are the transformers, a sect which believed that "Light alone existed, pure light, then part of it was transformed and became Darkness", ib.

⁷ Ed., 251—2 (above 87—8). Dhalla, I, c, 218—9 counts this sect as a heresy within Zoroastrianism.

⁸ Also called Sassāniyya, followers of Bihāfirīdh b. Maḥmūdīn, a reformer who was a contemporary of Abu Muslim. He at first accepted Islām under pressure from the general and became an 'Abbāsīd (Arab. عباسي), but later apostasized and was killed by him. Al-Bīrūnī reports nothing about this previous conversion. See an account of him Al-Bīrūnī, 193—4;

pared by all of them are forbidden and likewise marriage with their women. Al-Shāfi'i, Mālik, Abu Ḥanīfa, al-Auzā'i and al-Thauri are unanimous in ruling that it is right to take tribute from the Zarwāniyya and the Massīkihiyya¹. But they disagree about the ratio of their blood-money. Al-Shāfi'i said: The bloodwit for a Magian equals a fifth of the bloodwit for a Jew or a Christian² and the blood-money for a Jew or a Christian equals a third of the blood-money for a Muslim, so that the blood-money for the Magian amounts to a fifteenth³ of the blood-money for a Muslim. But Abu Ḥanīfa rules that the bloodwit for the Magian, the Jew and the Christian is equal to the bloodwit for the Muslim⁴.

From the Mazdakiyya among the Magians the acceptance of tribute is not allowed because they have dissociated themselves from the religion of the original Magians by permitting all the forbidden practices and by teaching that all men have an equal share in goods and women, and because of the other licentious practices. Similarly, the poll-tax may not be accepted from the Bihāfirīdhīyya, although their teachings are superior to the teachings of the original Magians⁵, because their religion was promulgated by their chief Bihāfirīdh during the era of Islām, and the acceptance of tribute from the adherent to any form of unbelief which has arisen since the institution of Islām is not permissible.

The jurists differ regarding the Šābians among the infidels⁶. Most of them rule that their status with respect to their meats, marriage of their women, and the poll-tax is like the status of the Christians; they are all permitted⁷. But others

Shahr., 187—88. The name of the native district of Bihāfirīdh is Khawwāf, near Nīshāpūr. Fihrist, 344 places him in Rawa near Nīshāpūr (Abrahashahr in Persian). See Houtsma's article WZKM, III (1889), 30—37.

¹ Umm, IV, 158; Mawatta, 146.

² Usūl, 319; Umm, VII, 291 and 294. The diyya (bloodwit) for Jews and Christians is 4000 dirhems, for a Magian 800, and for a Muslim 12000. Cf. Juythūl, 296, note two. Mālik sets the diyya of the Jew and Christian at 6000, Ibn Humam, VIII, 307.

³ Ed. and MS. عبد (fifth).

⁴ Usūl, 327; Umm, VII, Ibn Humam, ib.

⁵ Their practices according to Muslim authorities are nearer to Islām. They drink no wine and forbid illicit relationships. See Shahr. and Al-Bīrūnī, ib.

⁶ Usūl, 324—5. See also Ed., 263 (above 103).

⁷ Umm, IV, 158; V, 6.

differentiate as follows: those among the Ṣābians who profess the eternity of the Hyleic substance are subject to the same rulings as the supporters of the Hyleic hypothesis whom we have discussed previously. However, anyone among them who believes in the creation of the Universe but disputes us on the attributes of the Maker enjoys the same status as the Christians¹. This is our view. As regards the Barāhima, who disacknowledge all the prophets and apostles, the followers of al-Shāfi'i are agreed that, although they conform to the Muslims in their belief in the creation of the Universe and the unity of its Maker, their meats may not be eaten nor may their women be taken as wives. The controversy about taking tribute from them follows the same lines as in the case of idol-worshippers.

The jurists of Islam are unanimous in declaring the meats prepared by Jews, Samaritans and Christians to be lawful², in permitting the marriage of their women³, and in regarding the taking of tribute from them as lawful⁴. But they disagree on the rate of the poll-tax. Al-Shāfi'i said; Verily the contribution by every mature⁵ person amounts to one dinār as a ransom for his blood⁶. But Abu Ḥanifa ruled that the rich one is taxed forty-eight dirhems, the middle-class person twenty-four, and the poor twelve⁷. They also differ regarding the infliction of punishment on them. Al-Shāfi'i says that their punishments are the same as those for the Muslims, and the adulterer among them is to be stoned if he is a married man⁸. But Abu Ḥanifa ruled that they are not subject to stoning⁹. They also differ regarding their blood-money. Al-Shāfi'i said that the bloodwit for a Muslim, and the compensation for one of their women is a third of the blood-money of a Muslim

¹ A geographical distinction between the Ṣābians of Ḥarrān and those of Baṭṭā is made by the Ḥanīfite school. See ZDMG, xxxii (1878), 391—2.

² Sura 5, v. 7; Umm, II, 196 and IV, 187; Ibn Humam, VIII, 52.

³ Sura 5, v. 7; Umm, v. 5—6, and IV, 187; Ibn Humam, II, 509.

⁴ Sura 9, v. 29; Ibn Humam, IV, 370 and commentaries.

⁵ Arab. ḥāl; al-Shāfi'i relates that the Dhimīs of Yemen employed this term for ḥāl.

Umm, IV, 101.

⁶ Umm, IV, 101; Ibn Humam IV, 368; Jaynūbūl, 351.

⁷ Ibn Humam, ib.; Kitāb al-Kharāj, 146.

⁸ Umm, VI, 164 ff.; Ibn Humam, IV, 132—3; Mālik agrees with Abu Ḥanifa see Muwatta, 283 and commentary.

⁹ Ibn Humam, ib.

woman¹. Mālik ruled that the bloodwit for one of the People of the Book is half 349 the blood-money of the Muslim. Abu Ḥanifa ruled that it is exactly the same as the compensation for a Muslim². They differ regarding the application of the law of retaliation to them. Al-Shāfi'i said that no believer is to be killed for an infidel under any circumstances³, but Abu Ḥanifa said that a Muslim is to be killed for murdering a Yahūmi but not for the murder of a *Musta'min*⁴. They also differ regarding the exaction of the poll-tax from their aged Sheikh. Al-Shāfi'i required it⁵, but Abu Ḥanifa did not impose it save on one who is capable of leading in war⁶.

They disagree about the Thanaḥiyya, the Daisāniyya, the Markiūniyya among the Mānawīyya, who believe in the eternity of light and darkness and maintain that the world is composed of these two; the good and the beneficial come from light, and the evil and harmful come from darkness. Some of the legislators maintain that their status is like that of the Magians and they permit the acceptance of tribute from them although they forbid their meats and their women. But the approved view among us is that their position as regards marriage, meals and tribute is like that of the idol and image-worshippers which we have already explained.

As regards the infidels who have arisen since the institution of Islām, who take shelter in the external practices of Islām but slay the Muslims secretly, such as the Ghulāt among the Rawāfiḍ; the Sabābiyya, the Bayāniyya, the Muḥitiyya,

¹ Umm, VI, 92; Ibn Humam, VIII, 307.

² For Abu Ḥanifa's and Mālik's views see Ibn Humam, ib.

³ Umm, VII, 291 ff., 389—99 (margin); Ibn Humam, VIII, 255—7.

⁴ With MS. ḥāl; Ed., ḥāl. The Musta'min is a member of those groups whom Muslims are enjoined to kill, who has procured security from the Muslims by a pledge or treaty. Heffening, Das Islamische Fremdenrecht, has made a historical study of the status of the Musta'min in Islām.—For Abu Ḥanifa's ruling, see Ibn Humam, ib. He bases himself on a tradition according to which the Prophet ordered the execution of a Muslim who had killed a Dhimmi. Al-Shāfi'i who also reports this tradition, Umm, VI, 259 (margin) and VII, 389—99 refutes Abu Ḥanifa's standpoint. See also Heffening, l. c. 37—42.

⁵ Umm, IV, 98 bottom.

⁶ Ibn Humam, IV, 372—3. For the general question of the taxation of infidels in Islām, see Tritton, The Khalifs and their non-Muslim Subjects, 196—228.

the Mansūriyya, the Janābiyya, the Khattābiyya, the other groups of the Hūlūliyya, the Mukannāʿiyya, the Mubayyida in the country beyond the river Jāhūn, the Muḥammira of Azerbaijan and the Muḥammira of Tabaristān; those who profess metempsychosis, such as the followers of Ibn Abī-l-ʿAwjā, and those of the Mur-tazila who accept the views of Ahmad ibn Ḥārit; those the Khawārij who profess the opinion of the Yezidis, maintaining that the law of Islām will be abrogated by the promulgation of a law by a Persian prophet; those of the Khawārij who accept the views of the Maimuniyya and permit marriage with daughters of one's sons and daughters; those who follow the doctrines of the 'Azākira in Baghdad, or profess the views of the Hallājīyya, extremists among the Hūlūliyya, or share the opinion of the Barkūkiyya and the Ruzāmiyya who hold extravagant beliefs concerning Abu Muslim, the founder of the dynasty of the 'Abbāsids; those who adopt the attitude of the Kāmilīyya who declare the Companions heretics because they failed to pledge allegiance to 'Alī, and condemn 'Alī as an infidel because he refrained from fighting them,—the status of these enumerated groups is that of apostates from religion; their meals are not allowed and the marriage of their women is not permitted¹. It is not permissible to grant them the right to dwell within the Pale of Islām in exchange for the payment of tribute². It is necessary to call them to repentance. If they repent, well enough, but if not, it is one's duty to kill them³ and to seize their property as war spoils⁴. Opinion varies on the enslavement of their wives and children. Abu Ḥanīfa and also a group of Shāfiʿites, including Abu Ishāq al-Mervezi, author of the commentary⁵ sanction it⁶.

¹ Umm, VI, 155.

² Their status is thus like that of the Harbis.

³ Mawatta, 348 and comm.; Ibn Humam, IV, 386—7; Umm, VI, 148. al-Shāfiʿi condemns apostate men and women alike to death (ib., and 149), but Abu Ḥanīfa condemns only men, Ibn Humam, 388—9. See al-Shāfiʿi's dispute with him, Umm, VI, 150 ff.

⁴ This is in accordance with the principle that a Muslim cannot inherit a Kāfir. Mālik and Ahmad agree with him; Abu Ḥanīfa dissents, Ibn Humam IV, 391.

⁵ Abu Ishāq Ibrahim b. Ahmad al-Marwazi, d. 340 A. H. He was the greatest Shāfiʿite in his age. The commentary is on Muzāni's Epitome of the Kitaḥ al-Umm,—the real handbook of Shāfiʿite law,—which appears in the margin of the printed edition. See Iḫnāl, I, 7: Yaḳūt, IV, 512; Fihrist, 212.

⁶ Ibn Humam, IV, 403. K. al-Kharāj, 80.

Some of them forbid it¹. Those who allow it cite in support of their view the fact that Khālid ibn al-Walīd, when he fought the Banu Ḥanīfa and succeeded in slaying Musailima the Liar, made peace with the Banu Ḥanīfa in exchange for the gold and silver² and in exchange for a quarter of the prisoners among the women and children³, and he sent them to al-Medīna. Khawla, the mother of Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥanafiyya⁴, was one of them.

Concerning the people of fancy, such as the jāridiyya, the Ḥishāmiyya, the Najāriyya, and Jahmiyya, the Imāmiyya who condemn the nobles of the Companions as Kāfirs, the Kadariyya who deviate from the truth, the Bakriyya who are linked with Bakr ibn Uktl 'Abd-al-Wahid, the Dirāriyya, all the anthropomorphist sects, and the Khawārij, we brand them as heretics just as they declare the Sunnites heretics. Prayer in their behalf or after their death is not allowed. But our scholars differ regarding the problem of inheriting their property. Some of them say, we may inherit from them but they may not inherit from us. They base it on an opinion by Mu'ādh ibn Jabal that the Muslim may inherit from the Kāfir but the Kāfir may not inherit from the Muslim⁵. The approved course among us is that their property is regarded as booty, for inheritance is not allowed between them and between the Sunnites⁶. It has indeed been transmitted that our sage Abu 'Abdallah al-Ḥārith ibn Asad al-Muhāsibi did not⁷ take anything from the bequest of his father because the latter was a Kadariite⁸. Al-Shāfiʿi has decreed that the ¹ MS. and Ed. read عنه, which makes no sense and does not present the view of the Shāfiʿites. I therefore read له. See Umm, IV, 137 bottom; Muzāni, v. 165.

² Lit. yellow and white. Against al-Balādhuri (ed. de Goeje), 90, on whose authority Brockelmann wants to insert the word half (نصف) before silver and gold, we have the authority of Tab. I, 1952—3; IA, II, 279; Yaḳūt, II, 146—7, all of whom confirm our author's account.

³ Tab. ib. tells us that Khālid at first asked for half the women as prisoners but by a ruse arranged by Muḥja'a, the Ḥanafiite who turned traitor, Khālid agreed to a quarter. Yaḳūbi and Balādhuri, ib. agree with Tab.

⁴ With MS., Ed., عنه. See Bad' Wal-Tarīkh, v. 76 (Arab. 74).

⁵ Uṣūl, 341. Mu'āwiya also maintained this rule. See Shāfiʿi's objections, Umm, IV, 14. On Mu'ādh, see Nawāwī, 539—41.

⁶ Umm, IV, 13—6.

⁷ Adding له with MS.; missing in Ed.

⁸ Uṣūl, 341. He was a pious individual, learned in theology and a renowned Sūfi, d. 243. See Subki, l.c., II, 37—9, and Sam'āni, 509 b. Both sources assert that his father was prayers offered for the soul of one who professes the creation of the Kur'an and the denial of the Beatific Vision are to be declared void. Hishām ibn 'Ubadallah al-Rāzi¹ tells that Muhammad ibn al-Hasan ruled that anyone who prays for the soul of one who professes the creation of the Kur'an is to repeat his prayer². Yahya ibn Aktham³ reports that Abu Yusuf was asked what he thought of the Muṭazila and he answered: They are the Zandiks. Al-Shāfi'i had indicated in his book on Testimony that the testimony of people of fancy, with the exception of the Khattābiyya who allow perjury by their followers against their opponents⁴, may be accepted. But in the book on Analogy he points out that he has altered his policy of accepting testimony from the Muṭazila and the other people of fancy⁵. Malik rejected the testimony of the people of fancy, according to a tradition by Ashhab in the name of Ibn al-Kāsim and al-Hārith ibn Miskin in the name of Mālik who ruled regarding the Muṭazila: They are Zandiks, they are not to be called to repentance, but are to be killed.

352 As for those who transact business with them, selling and buying, the regulations bearing on it, according to the Orthodox, resemble the laws on the formation of partnership⁶ by Muslims who live in the frontier districts with people whom it is a duty to fight, although one is allowed to kill them. But a Muslim may not buy a copy of the Kur'an from them, nor a Muslim slave, according to the correct ruling of al-Shāfi'i's maḥabab.

The adherents of al-Shāfi'i differ regarding the status of the Kadariyya who have departed⁷ from the truth. There are some who declare that their status is the same as that of the Magians because of the Prophet's saying about the Kadara Rāfi'i although the former admits his possible Kadariism; Fihrist, 184. On his Sufism see Hujwiri, 176—83.

¹ See Lisān al-Mizān, VI, 195.

² Uṣūl, ib.

³ d. 242. He held a very high position at Basra under al-Ma'mun and was a highly distinguished kāfi. See the exceptionally long article on him in Ikhtal', IV, 33—49.

⁴ See above 62, note 7.

⁵ Uṣūl, 342, informs us that he changed his opinion only with respect to the Ghulāt.

⁶ Reading عاجل with Ed.; MS. عاجل.

⁷ Arabic: مجانن.

riyya: They are the Magians of the community¹. According to this view, the acceptance of tribute from them is lawful. But there are others who decide that their status is like that of apostates. Tribute, accordingly, is not to be taken from them but they are to be summoned to repent. If they repent, well enough: but if not, it is a duty upon the Muslims to kill them. We have made a detailed study of the rules governing the people of fancy in our Book of Religion and Dogmas. In this book we have gathered tidbits of the rules according to the Orthodox to an adequate degree. But God knows best.

¹ Wensinck, 121 a.

CHAPTER FOUR

OUR VIEWS ON THE PIOUS ANCESTRY OF THE COMMUNITY.

The Orthodox are agreed that the Emigrants and the Defenders among the Companions were believers¹. This is contrary to the opinion of those Rawāfiq who maintain that the Companions are heretics because of their failure to swear allegiance to 'Alī, and contrary to the opinion of the Kāmilīyya who declare 'Alī a Kāfir because he refused to make war on them. The Orthodox are agreed that those who apostatized after the death of the Prophet, such as the tribes of Kinda, Hanīfā, Fazāra, the Banu Asad, the Banu Kushayr and the Banu Bakr ibn Wail were not among the Defenders nor among the Emigrants before the capture of Mecca. The law has specified the name Emigrants to designate those who emigrated to the Prophet before the capture of Mecca, and they with the grace and kindness of God, trod the road of the righteous law and straight path.

The Orthodox agree that everyone who was present with the Apostle of God at the battle of Badr inhabits Paradise, and similarly those who were present with him at Uhud, except Kuzman whom tradition has excluded; also everyone who was present with him at the oath of good-will at al-Hudaybiyya. On the basis of a tradition which has come down they believe that seventy thousand members of the community of Islām will enter Paradise without a reckoning; among them is included 'Ukkāsha ibn Mihsan². Everyone of those will intercede in behalf of seventy thousand. They cherish the memory of people whom tradition has assured of a place in Paradise and of the power to intercede for all of the community, and among them they include Uwais al-Karāni³. The tradition regarding them is well known. They have decided to condemn as Kāfirs all those who brand as infidels any of the ten to whom the Prophet has promised Paradise. They cherish the memory of all the wives of the Apostle and they condemn as heretics those who declare them or any of them to be infidels¹. They love al-Hasan and al-Husain and all the well-known cousins of the Apostle of God such as al-Hasan ibn al-Hasan, 'Abdallah ibn al-Hasan, 'Alī ibn al-Husain Zair-al-'Abdīn, Muhammad ibn 'Alī ibn al-Husain, who was called al-Bākir. It is he to whom Jābir ibn 'Abdallah al-Anṣārī brought greetings from the Prophet. They love Jāfar ibn Muhammad known as al-Sādiq, Mūsā ibn Jāfar and 'Alī ibn Mūsā al Rida². They have the same feelings for the other offspring of 'Alī such as al-'Abbās, 'Onar, Muhammad ibn al-Hanafiyya, and the remainder of those who followed the traditions of their pious forefathers, but not those who learned to Mutazilism or Rāfidism, nor those who allied themselves with them, and displayed an extremely tyrannous conduct and oppression like al-Bakrā'i who oppressed the people of Basra unjustly and tyrannously. Most genealogists are of the opinion that he made false pretenses to be one of them, but was not really.

¹ Usul, 298—303.

² A fighter for Islām against the apostates in its early history. See his biography including his admission to Paradise, Nawāwī, 427—8.

³ One of the Followers, said to have been killed at al-Shiffin. Tab. III, 2476. He is known as the "Sayyid al-Jābirīn", Najīm, I, 127. Malik b. Anās doubted his existence, Muh. St. II, 147.

They cherish the noblest followers of the Companions in piety. It is they concerning whom God has revealed: "They say: our Lord! forgive us and those of our brethren who have precedence of us in faith and do not allow any spite to remain in our hearts toward those who believe"³. They affirm the same regarding those who accept publicly the fundamentals of the Orthodox, but they declare themselves free from the people of fancy who are excluded from Islām, and from the people of ering fancies who allege affiliation with Islām. These are the Kadariyya, the Murjiyya, the Rāfida, the Khawārij, the Jahmiyya, the Najjariyya and the Corporealists. A study of the peculiarities of these groups has already been presented in the chapter preceding this one, and in it there is sufficiency.

¹ II, IV, 117—21.

² For the various 'Aids see the genealogical table Shifites, II, 160.

³ Sura 59, v. 10.

ADDITIONAL NOTES.

P. 105, note 1. The attribute سخرية (wichecraft) and rendered "given to the art of witchcraft".

P. 140. The verses cited by Baghidādi from the "words of the shameless poet" belong to the celebrated Abu Nuwās. They are found in ibn Kutāiba's Kitāb al-Shi'r wal-Shu'arā' (ed. de Goetje), p. 510, in a variant version as follows:

تَعْلَمُ يَا لَيْلَى إِذْ أَنْتَ حَيَّةٌ وَبَعْدَ الْمَوْتِ مِنْ لَيْلَى وَخَيْرٌ
حَيَاتُهُ ثُمَّ مَوْتُهُ ثُمَّ بَعْدُ حَدِيثُ خُرَاقَةٍ يَا أُمَّ عَمْرٍو

Shahrastāni, p. 433, who quotes only the last couplet, agrees in his reading with ibn Kutāiba except that he reads نَشْرُ instead of بَعْدُ.

P. 155. On Humaid b. Thaur see ibn Kutāiba, l. c., pp. 230—33. The line quoted in our text occurs on p. 231, line 12, and reads:

يَنَامُ بِأَحَدَى مُتَلَبِّهٍ وَيَتَنَبَّي
الْمَنَا يَا أَخْرَى فَوَيْطَانِ هَاجِعٍ

P. 156. On Ibrahīm b. Harama see ibn Kutāiba, l. c., pp. 473—474. The line in our text is found on p. 474, line 9, and reads:

كَتَارَكَةٌ يَضْفَحُهَا بِالرَّاءِ
وَمُلْجَعَةٌ يَضْفَحُهَا أَخْرَى جَنَانُهَا

P. 184. The declaration attributed in our text to 'Alī sounds very similar to the statement ascribed by Abu-l-Mā'īf 'Abd-al-Mālik to al-Ash'ari:

كَانَ وَلَا مَكَانَ فَخُلِقَ الْمَرْشُ وَالْكَرْبِيُّ فَلَمْ يَجِجْ إِلَى
مَكَانٍ وَهُوَ بَعْدَ خَلْقِ الْكَانِ كَمَا كَانَ قَبْلَ خَلْقِهِ

(Cited in Spitta, Zur Geschichte al-Ash'aris, p. 141). The saying in our version is also popular among the Sūfis (Browne, Literary History of Persia, I, 438).

BIBLIOGRAPHY.

The bibliography is divided into three parts. The first includes titles of books which appear in the notes in abbreviated form; the second comprises the remaining more important bibliography, and the third contains encyclopedias and periodical literature. Works to which reference was made only once or twice are not generally listed. For the lack of correct transcription see the Preface.

'Aja'ib — Zakaria ibn Muhammad ibn Mahmūd al-Kazwini: Kitāb 'Aja'ib al-Makhlukat. Printed on the margin of Damiri's Hayat al-Hayawan.

See below.

Albiruni — Albiruni: Athar al-Bakiya. Chronology of Ancient Nations. Translated by G. Edward Sachau. London, 1879.

Andrae, Muhammad — Tor Andrae: Die Person Muhammads. Stockholm, 1918.

Ash'ari — Abu-l-Hasan 'Alī ibn Ismā'il al-Ash'ari: Makalat al-Islamiyin wa-Ikhilafih-i-Mudillim. Edited by Hellmut Ritter. Two volumes. Istanbul, 1930.

Bad'wal-Ta'rikh — Murahhar ibn Tahir al-Makdisi: Bad'wal-Ta'rikh. Edited and Translated by Cl. Huart. Six volumes. Paris, 1899—1919.

Baid, Baidawi — Nasir al-Din Abu Sa'id Abdallah 'Omar al-Baidawi: Anwar al-Tanzil-Asrar al-Ta'wil (Commentary on the Kur'an); edited by H. O. Fleischer. Two volumes. Leipzig, 1846—1848.

Bloch et — E. Blochet: Le Messianisme dans l'hétérodoxie musulmane. Paris, 1903.

Brockelmann — Carl Brockelmann: Geschichte der arabischen Literatur. Two volumes. Weimar and Berlin, 1898—1902.

Bukhari — Abu 'Abdallah Muhammad ibn Ismā'il al-Bukhari: Al-Jami' al-Sahih. Edited by Kireh and Juyrboll. Leyden, 1862—1907.

- Creencia — Algel: El justo medio en la creencia. Compendio de teología dogmática. Traducción española por Miguel Asín Palacios (translation of Abu Hamid al-Ghazali's Kitab al-Ihtisad fil-Tihād [Cairo. n.d.]). Madrid, 1929.
- Damiri — Kamal-al-Din al-Damiri: Hayat al-Hayawan al-Kubra. Two volumes. Cairo, 1311 A. H.
- De Goeje — M. J. de Goeje: Mémoire sur les Carmathes du Bahrain et les Fatimides. Leyden, 1886.
- De Sacy — Silvestre de Sacy: Exposé de la religion des Druzes. Two volumes. Paris, 1838.
- Al-Durra al-Fakhira — Abu Hamid Muhammad al-Ghazali: Al-Durra al-Fakhira (La perle précieuse), Edited and Translated by Lucien Gautier. Geneva, 1878.
- Ed. — The Printed Arabic Text of Baghdad's Kitab al-fark baina-l-tyrak.
- Filrist — Al-Nadim: Kitab al-Fihrist, ed. Flügel, (posthumously published by Johannes Roediger and August Mueller). Two volumes bound in one. Leipzig, 1871.
- Fiqh al-Akbar — Abu Hanifa al-Numan ibn Thabit al-Kufi: Al-Fiqh al-Akbar, with a commentary by Abu-l-Muniri Ahmad ibn Muhammad al-Maghnisawi al-Hanaf. Hyderabad, 1321. The authenticity of the authorship of the Fiqh al-Akbar has been denied.
- Flügel, Schulen — Gustav Flügel: Die grammatischen Schulen der Araber. Erste Abteilung. Leipzig, 1862.
- Guyard — Stanislas Guyard: Fragments relatifs à la doctrine des Ismaélis, texte. . . . avec une traduction complète et des notes. (Published in Notes et Extraits des manuscrits de la bibliothèque nationale), vol. XXII, 177-428. Paris, 1874.
- Hamilton's Hedaya — Charles Hamilton: The Hedaya or Guide. (Second Edition by Standish Grove Grady). London, 1870.
- Hilli — Hasan ibn Yusuf ibn 'Ali ibn al-Mu'athhar al-Hilli: Al-Babu 'l-Hadi 'Ashar (A treatise on the Principles of Shi'ite Theology) with commentary by Miqdad-Fadl al-Hilli. Translated by William McElwee Miller. London, 1928.

- Horten, Probleme — M. Horten: Die philosophischen Probleme der spekulativen Theologie im Islam. Bonn, 1910.
- Horten, Systeme — M. Horten: Die philosophischen Systeme der spekulativen Theologie im Islam. Bonn, 1912.
- Hyat-ul-Kuloob — Hyat-ul-Kuloob: The Life and Religion of Mohammed as contained in the Sheeah Traditions. Translated from Persian by James L. Merrick. Boston, 1890.
- Hiri — Philip K. Hiri, Editor: Mukhtasar Kitab al-fark baina-l-tyrak (English Title: Al-Baghdadi's Characteristics of Muslim Sects, abridged). Cairo, 1924.
- IA — Abu-l-Husain 'Ali ibn Muhammad al-Shaibani ibn al-Athir: Kitab al-Kamil fil-Tarikh. Edited by C. J. Tornberg. Fourteen volumes. Leyden, 1867.
- Ibana — Abu-l-Hasan 'Ali ibn Isma'il al-Ash'ari: Kitab al-Ibana 'an Usul al-Diyana. Hyderabad, 1321 (?).
- Ibn Humam — Muhammad ibn 'Abd-al-Wahid ibn al-Humam: Fath al-Kadir. With supercommentaries. Eight volumes. Bulak, 1315.
- Ibn Iskander — Husain ibn Iskander al-Hanafi: Kitab al-Jawhara al-Munifa. Hyderabad, 1321.
- Ibn Maja — Muhammad ibn Yazid ibn Maja: Sunan. Two volumes. Cairo, 1313.
- Ibn Rosteh — Abu 'Ali Ahmad ibn 'Omar ibn Rosteh: Kitab al-A'laq al-Nafisa, and Ahmad ibn Abu Yakub ibn Wadh al-Yakubi: Kitab al-Buldan. Edited by M. J. de Goeje (Bibliotheca Geographorum Arabicorum, Pars VII). Leyden, 1892.
- IH — Abu Muhammad 'Ali ibn Ahmad ibn Hazm al-Zahiri: Kitab-al-Fisal fil-Milal wal-Ahw wal-Nihal. Five volumes. Cairo, 1317-1327 (?) A. H.
- IHauf, IHaufkal — Abu-l-Kasim ibn Haufkal: Kitab al-Masalik wal-Mamalik. Edited by M. J. de Goeje (Bibliotheca Geographorum Arabicorum, Pars II). Leyden, 1873.
- Ijaz — Abu Bekr Ahmad ibn 'Ali ibn-al-Tayyib al-Baklani: Kitab Tijaz al-Kur'an. Cairo, 1315 A. H.
- IKhalid — Abu Zaid 'Abd-Al-Rahman b. Muhammad ibn Khalidun: Prolegomenes (Arab: Mukaddima), French Translation by Mac Guckin de-Slane.

Published in Nates et extraits des manuscrits de la bibliothèque impériale, vols. XIX-XXI (Part one of each volume is the translation, part two the text). The references are to the Translation. Paris, 1862-68.

IKhall — Abu-l-Abbas Ahmad ibn Ibrahim ibn Khalikan: Wafayat al-A'yan (Biographical Dictionary). Translated by MacCuckin de Slane. Four volumes. Paris, 1843-71.

Intiser — 'Abd al-Rahman ibn Muhammad ibn 'Uthman al-Khayyat: Kitab al-Intiser wal-Radd 'ala ibn Rawandi. Edited by H. S. Nyberg. Cairo, 1925.

Ist. B. P. — Shuhur ibn Tahir ibn Muhammad al-Istirani: Kitab al-fark bain al-firq. Ms. Ahlwardt's Catalogue of Berlin MSS., No. 2801; Bibliothèque Nationale, No. 1400.

Irshad — Abu 'Abdallah Ya'qub ibn 'Abdallah: Irshad al-Arib ila Marifat al-Adib, edited by D. S. Margoliouth. Vols. I, II, III, V, VI. Leyden 1907-1913. (E. J. W. Gibb Memorial, VI, 1-3, 5-6).

Israkhi — Abu Ishak Ibrahim ibn Muhammad al-Farsi al-Irakhi: Kitab Masalik al-Mamalik. Edited by de Goeje (Bibliotheca Geographorum Arabicorum, Pars I). Leyden, 1870.

Koranslegung — Ignaz Goldziher: Die Richtungen der islamischen Koran-anslegung. Leiden, 1920.

Kashf — 'Ali ibn 'Uthman al-Jullabi al-Hujwiri: Kashf al-Mahjub. Translated by R. A. Nicholson (E. J. W. Gibb Memorial, XVII). Leyden, 1911.

Lisan al-Mizan — Shihab al-Din Abu-l-Fadl Ahmad ibn 'Ali ibn Hajjar al-Askalani: Lisan al-Mizan. Six volumes. Hyderabad, 1329-31 A. H.

Makrizi — Taki-al-Din Ahmad ibn 'Ali ibn 'Abd al-Kadir ibn Muhammad known as Makrizi: Kitab al-Khitat. Two volumes. Bulak, 1270 A. H. —

Unless otherwise stated the references are to vol. II.

Makrizi (Fagnan) — E. Fagnan: Nouveaux textes historiques relatifs à l'Afrique du Nord et à la Sicile. 1. — La biographie d'Obeid Allah..... de Makrizi. Published in Centenario di Michele Amari, Palermo, 1910, vol. II, 35-86.

Massignon—Louis Massignon: La Passion d'al-Husain ibn Mansour al-Halladi. Two volumes. Paris, 1922.

Mauidi — Kitab Sharh al-Fiqh al-Akbar III Imam Abi

Mansur Muhammad ibn Muhammad al-Hanafi al-Mauidi al-Samar-kandi. Hyderabad, 1321 A. H. Mauidi's authorship of the work has been denied.

Miskawih — Ahmad ibn Muhammad ibn Miskawih: The Eclipse of the 'Abbasid Caliphate. Edited and Translated by H. F. Amedroz and D. S. Margoliouth. Six volumes and an Index. Oxford, 1920-1.

Mizan — Shams al-Din Abu 'Abdallah Muhammad ibn Ahmad al-Dhalabi: Mizan al-Fidal wa-Nakad al-Rijal. Three volumes. Cairo, 1325.

MS. — Manuscript of Baghdad's Al-Fark bain al-firq. Ahlwardt's Catalogue of MSS. in Berlin, No. 2800.

Mudawwana — Malik ibn Anas: Al-Mudawwana al-kubra. Cairo, 1323.

Muslim — Muslim ibn al-Hajjaj Sahih. With a commentary by Nawawi. Five volumes.

Muh. St. I-II—Ignaz Goldziher: Muhammedanische Studien. Two volumes. Halle, 1889-90.

Mukkad, Mukaddasi — Shams al-Din Abu 'Abdallah Muhammad ibn Ahmad al-Mukaddasi: Al-Masalik fil-Mamalik. Edited by M. J. de Goeje (Bibliotheca Geographorum Arabicorum, Pars III). Leyden, 1879.

Muruj — Abu-l-Hasan 'Ali ibn al-Husain ibn 'Ali al-Mas'udi: Kitab Muruj al-Dhahab wa-Ma'adin al-Jawahir. Edited and Translated by Barbier de Meynard and Pavet de Courville (Under title Prairies d'or). Nine volumes. Paris, 1861-77.

Muwatta — Malik ibn Anas: Kitab al-Muwatta. Kazan, 1909.

Naubakhi — Abu-l-Hasan al-Naubakhi: Firq al-Shi'a. Edited by Hellmut Ritter. Istanbul, 1933.

Nawawi — Abu Zakariya Yahya Al-Nawawi: Biographical Dictionary. Edited by F. Wüstenfeld. Göttingen, 1842-47.

Nujum — Abu-l-Mahasin Taghri Birdi — Al-Nujum al-Zahira [Annales]. Edited by Junboll and Marthes. Two volumes. Leyden, 1855-61.

Nuzhat — Hamdullah al-Musta'fi al-Kazwini: The Zoological Section of Nuzhat-ul-Qulub. Edited and Translated by J. Stephenson. London, 1928.

Razi — M. Horten: Die spekulative und positive Theologie des Islam nach Razi (1209) und ihre Kritik durch Tusi (1273). Leipzig, 1912.

- Sam'ani — 'Abd al-Karim ibn Muhammad al-Sam'ani: Kitab al-Ansab. Reproduced in Facsimile by D. S. Margoliouth (E. J. W. Gibb Memorial, XX). Leyden and London, 1912.
- Seelye — Kate Chambers Seelye: Moslem Schisms and Sects (Part I of the Kitab al-Fark bain al-Firak of Baghdad in Translation). New York, 1919.
- Shahr. or Shahr. (Haarbrücker) — Abu-l-Fath Muhammad al-Shahrastani: Kitab al-Milal wal-Nihal, edited by Cureton. Two volumes, London, 1842-46. — Religions-Partheien und Philosophen-Schulen. Theodor Haarbrücker. Two volumes, Halle, 1850-51.
- Shiites I, II — Israel Friedlaender: The Heterodoxies of the Shiites in the Presentation of Ibn Hazm. Part one: Text and editorial notes. Part two: Commentary. Published in JAOS, XXVIII (Jan-June 1907), 1-80, and XXXIX (1908), 1-183, respectively. Also in a separate volume, New Haven, 1909.
- Streitschrift — Ignaz Goldziher: Streitschrift des Gazali gegen die Batiniyya Sekte. (A detailed presentation of the contents of al-Mustashiri, with 29 excerpts in Arabic). Leiden, 1916.
- Tab. or Tabari — Abu Ja'far Muhammad ibn Jarir al-Tabari: Ta'rikh al-Rusul wal-Muluk [Annales]. Edited by M. J. de Goeje. Twelve volumes. Leyden, 1879-1901.
- Tab. (Zotenberg) — Chronique de Tabari. Traduite par Hermann Zotenberg. Four volumes. Paris, 1867-74.
- Tanbih — Abu-l-Hasan 'Ali ibn al-Husain ibn 'Ali al-Mas'udi: Tanbih — Le Livre de l'avertissement et de la revision. Traduction par Carra de Vaux. Paris, 1896.
- Tayalisi — Abu Daud Sulaiman ibn Daud al-Tayalisi: Musnad. Hyderabad, 1321 A. H.
- Tirmidhi — Abu 'Abdallah Muhammad ibn Isa al-Tirmidhi: Sahih. Two volumes.
- Umm — Abu 'Abdallah Muhammad ibn Idris al-Shafi'i: Kitab Al-Umm. With the Mukhtasar of Abu Ibrahim Isma'il ibn Yahya al-Muzani.
- Usul — Abu Mansur 'Abd-al-Kahir b. Tahir al-Tamimi al-Baghdadi: Usul al-Din. Volume One (Name of Editor not given). Istanbul, 1928.

- Urbi — Abu-l-Utbi: Kitab-i-Yamini. Translated by James Reynolds. London, 1858.
- Uyun — Ibn Qutaiba: Uyun al-Akhbar. Edited by Brockelmann. Berlin, 1900.
- Vorlesungen — Ignaz Goldziher: Vorlesungen ueber dem Islam. Second edition by Franz Babinger. Heidelberg, 1922.
- Wensinck — A. J. Wensinck: A Handbook of Muhammadan Tradition. Alphabetically arranged. Leiden, 1927.
- Wüstenfeld: Geschichte d. Fatimidschen Chalfen. Göttingen, 1880-81.
- Ya'kubi — Ahmed ibn Abu Yakub ibn Ja'far ibn Wab: Historia. Edited by M. Th. Houtsma. Two volumes. Leyden, 1883.
- Yakut — Abu 'Abdallah Yakut ibn 'Abdallah: Kitab Mu'jam al-Buldan. Edited by F. Wüstenfeld. Six volumes. Leipzig, 1866-1870.
- Zamakhshari — Abu-l-Kasim Mahmud ibn 'Omar al-Zamakhshari: Kashshaf 'an Hakaik al-Tanzil. Edited by W. Nassau Leés. Two volumes. Calcutta, 1856-9.
- Zambauf, E.: Manuel de généalogie et de chronologie. Hanover, 1972.
- Section II
- Ahmad ibn Hanbal: Masnad. Six volumes. Cairo 1313 A. H.
- M. Asin Palacios: Abernascarra y su escuela. Madrid, 1914.
- Ibn Hajar al-'Askalani: A Biographical Dictionary of People Who Knew Muhammad. Edited by Maulvi Abd-ul-Hai. Four volumes. Calcutta, 1856-1873.
- L. Bouvat: Les Bernécides. Paris, 1912.
- Harold Bowen: The Life and Times of 'Ali ibn Isa. Cambridge, 1928.
- Browne, E. G.: A Literary History of Persia. Volume one. London, 1909.
- Idem: A Volume of Oriental Studies, Presented to. Cambridge, 1922.
- Rudolph Ernst Brunnow: Die Charidschiten. Leiden, 1884.
- E. C. Burkitt: The Religion of the Manichees. Cambridge, 1925.
- Leone Caetani: Annali dell' Islam. Ten volumes. Rome, 1905-26.
- Arthur Christensen: Le premier homme et le premier roi. Stockholm, 1918.
- Chwolson, D.: Die Sabier und der Sabismus. St. Petersburg, 1856.
- Henri Galland: Essai sur les Molazelites. Paris.
- Ignaz Goldziher: Die Zahriten. Leipzig, 1884.

- Willi Hefening: Das islamische Fremdenrecht. Hanover, 1925.
- A. V. W. Jackson: Zoroaster, The Prophet of Ancient Iran. New York, 1899.
- Ferdinand Justi: Iranisches Namenbuch. Marburg, 1895.
- H. Lammen: Le Califat de Yazid Ier. Beyrouth, 1921.
- Louis Massignon: Essai sur les origines du lexique technique de la mystique musulmane. Paris, 1922.
- Nizam oul-Moulk: Siasat Naneh. Transl. by Charles Schefer. Paris, 1893.
- William Muir: The Caliphate. Its Rise, Decline and Fall. Edited by T. H. Weir. Edinburgh, 1924.
- August Muellet: Der Islam im Morgen- und Abendland. Two volumes. Berlin, 1885-7.
- A. Querry: Droit Musulman. Recueil de Lois Scheyites. Two volumes. Paris, 1871-2.
- Jalal-al-Din Suyuti: Al Durar al Hisan fil-Ba'ith al Na'im. Cairo, 1904 A. H.
- Jalal-al-Din Suyuti: History of the Caliphs. Translated by H. S. Jarret. Calcutta, 1881.
- 'Ali Tabari: The Book of Religion and Empire. Edited and Translated by A. Mingana. Two volumes. Manchester, 1922-3.
- A. S. Tritton: The Caliphs and Their Non-Muslim Subjects. London, 1930.
- J. Wellhausen: The Arab Kingdom and Its Fall. Translated by Margaret Graham Weir. Calcutta, 1927.
- M. Wolff: Muhammedanische Eschatologie. Arabic Text Edited and Translated. Leipzig, 1872.
- Abu Yusuf Yakub: Kitab al-Kharaj (Le Livre de l'impôt foncier). Translated by E. Fagnan, Paris, 1921.
- Jurji Zaydan: Umayyads and Abbassids. Translated by D. S. Margoliouth. (E. J. W. Gibb Memorial). Leyden, 1907.
- Part. III
- ERE - Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics.
- EI - Encyclopedia of Islam.
- Islam - Der Islam.
- JA - Journal Asiatique.
- JAOS - Journal of the American Oriental Society.

- JQR - Jewish Quarterly Review.
- REJ - Revue des Etudes Juives.
- MM - Revue du Monde Musulman.
- Le Monde Oriental.
- ZA - Zeitschrift für Assyriologie.
- ZDMG - Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft.

INDEX

A.

- Aaron, Harun 45; 134 n.
 Abbad b. Sulaiman al-Daimari 101; 101 n.
 Abbas 213; 229.
 Abbasa (sister of al-Rashid) 118 n.
 Abbasids 60 n; 74; 75; 83 n; 93 n; 94 n;
 110 n; 117 n; 121 n; 127 n; 128 n;
 220; 224.
 Abdallah (Bapak's father) 88 n; 89 n; 115 n;
 Abdallah ibn Abbas 44; 165 n; 167; 168;
 215.
 Abdallah b. Ali al-Saffah 74; 75 n.
 Abdallah b. Amr b. Harb al Kindi 56.
 Abdallah b. Fath 64 n.
 Abdallah b. al-Harith (or al-Harb) 60 n.
 Abdallah b. al-Hasan b. al-Hasan 53 n; 59;
 229.
 Abdallah b. Khazim al-Sulami 142; 142 n.
 Abdallah b. Maimun 131; 134 n.
 Abdallah ibn Mas'ud 16; 16 n; 164; 164 n;
 165 n.
 Abdallah ibn Muawiyah ibn Abdallah ibn
 Ja'far 32; 56 n; 59-61; 60; 60 n; 74;
 93.
 Abdallah b. Muhammad al-Hanafiyya, abu
 Hashim 46; 56; 56 n; 59; 61 n; 74;
 74 n.
 Abdallah b. Omar 59 n.
 Abdallah ibn Saba 41; 41 n; 42; 43 n; 44;
 44 n.
 Abdallah b. Sallam 68 n;
 Abdallah ibn Sawda 43; see Abdallah ibn
 Saba, 43 n; 44; 45.
 Abdallah b. Tahir 89 n; 90 n; 114.
 Abdallah b. Walid al-Rasbi 212.
 Abd-al-Kahir 157 n.
 Abd-al-Karim b. Abu-l-Awja 94; 94 n; 95
 Abd-al-Malik b. Kurayb al-Asma'i 152; 152 n;
 153; 155 n; 161; 161 n.
 Abd Rabih 35 n (see Zurara ibn A'yun).
 Abd-al-Rahman b. Auf 218.
 Abd-al-Rahman ibn Mujaam (al-Sarim) 45.
 Abdan 110 n; 111 n; 112 n.
 Abraham 134 n.
 Abu-l-Abbas b. Ata 82.
 Abu Abbas al-Sarraj 11 n.
 Abu Abdallah al-Ardi or al-Adi 119.
 Abu Abdallah al-dai' al-shi'i al-Mutessib
 112 n; 119 n.
 Abu Abdallah b. Hafif 82.
 Abu Ali b. Simjur 129; 129 n; 130; 130 n.
 Abu Amr b. al-Ala 153 n; 161; 161 n.
 Abu Ayyub al-Ansari 168.
 Abu Bekr al-Asaun 178 n.
 Abu Bekr b. Daud 82; 82 n; 83.
 Abu Bekr b. Muhaj 113; 113 n.
 Abu Bekr al-Siddik 42 n; 43; 43 n; 51;
 51 n; 52; 52 n; 60; 65; 70 n; 140;
 140 n; 141; 141 n; 160; 169; 210 n;
 211; 213; 213 n; 214 n.

Abu Dharr al-Ghifari 99.
 Abu-l-Farab al-Maliki 86.
 Abu-l-Faraj 90 n.
 Abu-l-Fawaris 146 n.
 Abu Hanifa 4; 4 n; 50 n; 159 n; 160;
 160 n; 202 n; 216 n; 219; 221; 222;
 222 n; 223; 223 n; 224; 224 n.
 Abu Hashim b. al-Jubbai 173; 182.
 Abu Haum Jafar Makizum 112; 112 n.
 Abu-l-Hudhal 168; 180; 181; 185; 187 n;
 191; 209.
 Abu Humayn al-Dimishki 32; 78; 78 n; 99.
 Abu Huraira 166; 166 n; 192 n.
 Abu Imran 88 n.
 Abu Isa al-Istahani 104 n.
 Abu Ishak Isfarini 21 n; 213 n.
 Abu-l-Kasim al-Hasan b. Ali Daszamad 190;
 190 n.
 Abu Khalaf b. Abd-al-Malik al-Sulami 191 n.
 Abu-l-Khattab Muhammad b. Abu Zainab al-
 Asadi 32; 62; 62 n; 63; 63 n; 64; 64 n;
 65; 65 n; 74; 93.
 Abu Kubaib, M. 3 n; 33.
 Abu-l-Ma'ali Abd-al-Malik 184 n.
 Abu Mansur Buwaib b. Rukn-al-Dawla,
 Mu'awiyid al-Dawla 140 n.
 Abu Mannur al-Ijli 31; 57; 58.
 Abu Mu'adh al-Tunani 4; 4 n.
 Abu Muslim al-Harrani 60; 60 n; 74; 74 n.
 75; 75 n; 76; 93; 93 n; 98; 101-2; 220 n.
 224.
 Abu Muslimya 75; 75 n; 92 n.
 Abu-l-Rabi' 64 n.
 Abu Sa'id al-Jannabi 111; 118 n.
 Abu Shakir al-Daisani 32 n.
 Abu Shalegh Ahmad b. Muhammad 111 n.
 Abu Shur 1, 1 n; 6; 6 n; 7; 7 n.
 Abu Thauban 5 (see Thauban).
 Abu Thaur, Ibrahim b. Khalid al-Kalbi 160;
 160 n.
 Abu Ubaid al-Kasim b. Sallam al-Harawi 161;
 161 n.
 Abu Ubaid b. al-Jarrah 217 n; 218.
 Abu Yakub al-Akka 82.
 Abu Yusuf Yakub b. Ibrahim al-Kadi 5; 226.
 Abu Zaid 153 n.
 Abu Zaid al-Balkhi 192 n.
 Abu Zakaria al-Tammami 118; 118 n; 122 n.
 Abyssinia 41 n.
 Adam 28 n; 60; 76; 79; 99; 100; 134 n;
 135; 135 n; 199.
 Adhakiriya 40; see Azakira.
 al-Adi 119 n.
 Adi, Bannu 140; 140 n; 141.
 Adrian 142 n; 211; 211 n.
 Adoptianists 99 n.
 Aharan 133.
 al-Ashiq 18; 18 n; 42 n; 88 n; 114; 114 n; 115.
 Afrasiya 64 n.
 al-Afrakin 128 n.
 Ahi-al-Bait 58 n.
 Ahmad b. Abd-al-Aziz b. Abu Dulaf 109 n.
 Ahmad b. Ayyub b. Yansh 93; 97-98.
 Ahmad b. Hatir 84; 93; 95; 96 n; 97; 97 n;
 98; 99-100; 101; 185; 224.
 Ahmad b. Hanbal 160; 217 n; 224 n.
 Ahmad b. al-Kayal 109 n.
 Ahmad b. Muhammad b. Abdus 86.
 Ahmad b. Omar b. Suraj, Abu-l-Abbas 81;
 82 n; 83; 86.
 Ahmad b. Tulun 124.
 Ahraman, Ahrihan 117; 131; 185; 220 n.
 Al-Abza 111 n; 118; 120; 123.
 Ahuramazda 117 n; 220 n.
 Ahwaz 108; 131.

Aihala b. Karb al-Aswad al-Ansi 201; 201 n.
 Aisha 60; 105; 167; 168; 214; 214 n; 215;
 215 n.
 Ajarida 105.
 Al-Akfish 161; 161 n.
 al-Akhash al-Akbar, Abd-al-Hamid b. Abdal-Majid 161; 161 n.
 Akil b. Abu Talib 109.
 Akl 116; 116 n; 117 n.
 Alamuya 54 n.
 Albirani 104 n; 119 n; 120 n; 121 n; 122 n;
 220 n.
 Aleppo 78; 107 n.
 Alexander 120; 122 n.
 Alfishin 88; 89; 89 n; (see Ashin).
 Ali b. Abu Talib 2 n; 15; 27; 31; 41;
 41 n; 42; 42 n; 43; 44; 44 n; 45; 45 n;
 49; 50 n; 51 n; 52; 52 n; 55; 55 n;
 57 n; 59; 59 n; 60; 61 n; 62; 63; 64 n;
 65; 66; 67; 67 n; 68; 68 n; 70; 70 n;
 74 n; 93; 105; 111 n; 124 n; 160; 166;
 166 n; 167; 168; 169; 183; 184;
 185; 211; 211 n; 213; 214; 214 n; 215;
 215 n; 224; 228; 229.
 Alids 49 n; 52 n; 60 n.
 Ali al-Aswani 187; 187 n.
 Ali al-Hadi 70 n.
 Ali b. Abdallah b. al-Abbas 74 n.
 (Ali) b. al-Fadi 123; 123 n; 124 n.
 Ali b. al-Husain, Zain al-Abidin 50 n; 229.
 Ali b. Musa al-Rida 229.
 Ali-Dahi 69 n (see Dhamniyya).
 Al-Amin 5 n.
 Amir b. Shurahl al-Shabi 42; 43.
 Amirak al-Tusi 190.
 Ammar 168.
 Amr 140.
 Amr b. al-Asi 70 n; 215 n;
 Amr b. Jurmuz 214; 214 n.
 Amr b. Ubaid 43 n; 168.
 Amr b. Uthman al-Mekki 82.
 Andae, Tor 26 n.
 Anthropomorphists, see Mushabbha.
 Anushirvan Chosrau 87; 87 n; 113 n.
 Arabia 105 n.
 Arabs 2 n; 38; 51 n; 92 n; 119; 120; 126 n;
 141; 141 n; 142 n; 152; 153; 154;
 154 n; 157; 175; 185 n; 211; 211 n;
 219.
 Aristotle 152; 178.
 Aristotelians 182 n.
 Armenia 160 n.
 Asad, Bannu 38; 62 n; 228.
 Asas 115; 115 n; 117; 134; 134 n.
 Asfar b. Shirwan 113.
 Al-Asfar al-Ukaili 127; 127 n.
 Al-Ash'ari, Abu-l-Hasan; 4 n; 5 n; 8 n; 14 n;
 15; 20 n; 26; 33 n; 50 n; 56 n; 58 n;
 61 n; 62 n; 63 n; 64 n; 65 n; 92 n;
 103 n; 159 n; 186 n; 187 n; 191 n;
 193 n; 195 n; 197 n; 198 n; 201 n;
 210 n; 211 n; 213 n; 216 n; 217.
 al-Ash'ari, Abu Musa 81 n; 215 n.
 Ash'arites 152 n; 159; 185 n; 190 n; 191 n;
 198 n; 199 n; 200 n; 201 n.
 Ashhab 226.
 Asia 122 n; 142 n.
 Asin Palacios, M. 47 n.
 Askar Muktram 101; 101 n.
 Al-Asma'i see Abd-al-Malik b. Abu Kurab.
 Assassins 146 n.
 Al-Auzai, Abd-al-Rahman b. Amr b. Yuhmid
 160; 160 n; 221.
 Azakira 32; 40; 73; 84-86; 224.
 Azarka 207 n;
 Azd, Bannu 142 n; 215.

- Bab 48.
Babak al-Khurami 88; 88 n; 89; 90; 90 n;
109 n; 114; 114 n; 115.
Babakuya 88; 89; 89 n; 90; 107 n; 114.
Babylon 121.
al-Badan, Jabal 88; 88n; 109; 114.
Badr, Battle of 15; 168; 218; 228.
Badr al-Hamami al-Kahir 124; 124 n.
Bagdad, Bagdad 5; 32; 80; 81 n; 82; 83;
84; 89 n; 107 n; 113; 121; 125; 125 n;
126; 126 n; 186; 188; 224.
Al-Baghdadi, Abd-al-Kahir ibn Tahir 12; 20 n;
23; 37 n; 43 n; 44 n; 45; 48 n; 51 n;
55; 56 n; 58 n; 62 n; 65; 68 n; 73 n;
79; 83 n; 92 n; 94 n; 100; 101 n;
107 n; 108 n; 110 n; 112 n;
115 n; 116 n; 117 n; 126 n; 128 n;
129 n; 130 n; 131; 134 n; 141; 143 n;
144 n; 145; 145 n; 151; 157 n; 164 n;
172 n; 189 n; 191 n; 193 n; 194 n;
195 n; 199 n; 210 n; 211 n; 213 n.
Bihafiridh b. Mahmurudhin 220 n; 221; 221 n.
Bihafiridhiyya 220; 220 n; 221.
Bahrein 107 n; 111 n; 118; 121 n; 126.
Bahya b. Pakuda 172 n; 185 n.
al-Baida 80.
Baidawi 20 n.
Bajja, Bann 49 n; 58 n.
Bakmar 53.
al-Bakiani, Abu Bekr b. al-Taib al-Ashari 81;
81 n; 191 n; 202 n; 204 n; 211 n.
Bakriyya 57 n.
Bakr ibn ukri Abd-al-Wahid ibn Ziyad 15;
16 n; 225.
Bakr b. Wa'il, Bann 228.
Bakriyya 15-16; 15 n; 169; 225.
Bakruram 190.
Balam b. Ba'ura 203.
al-Baladhuri 222 n.
Balha 13 n; 105 n; 119 n.
al-Ballal, abu Shuaib (the Pious) 164; 164 n.
Balasghun, Balasghun 122; 122 n.
Bandana, abu Ya'qub al-Sifizi 113.
Baradha 191 n.
al-Baradhai 131 n. (see Bandana).
Barhima 199; 199 n; 200; 208; 222.
Baramika, Barmecid 117; 117 n.
al-Baraka'i 229.
Barkukiyya, Barkukiyya 73; 75; 224.
Barham & Joseph 200 n.
Barmak 118 n.
al-Barmaki, Ja'far b. Yahya 117 n; 118 n;
Bashir al-Rahhal 53; 53 n.
Bashshar b. Burd 139 n.
Bastamiyya 15 n.
Basra 22; 34; 35; 53; 53 n; 81; 94 n; 109;
107 n; 125; 125 n; 127; 142 n; 162 n;
161 n; 165; 180; 182; 190; 191; 208;
214; 215 n; 226 n; 229;
Batha 222 n.
Bathiyya 39; 40; 58 n; 63 n; 76 n; 95 n;
107-157; 107 n; 108; 108 n; 109; 110;
112; 113; 113 n; 114; 114; 115; 115 n;
116; 116 n; 117; 117 n; 118; 119; 122;
123; 128; 129; 130; 131; 131 n; 132;
132 n; 133; 134 n; 135 n; 136; 137 n;
138; 139; 140; 141; 141 n; 142; 144 n;
145; 145 n; 148; 149; 152; 157; 178;
206; 206 n.
Bayan ibn Sam'an (al-Tamimi) 31; 46-48;
46 n; 48 n; 49 n; 52 n; 56; 74; 93.
Bayaniyya 31; 39; 40; 46-48; 56; 63; 73;
74; 92; 93; 201; 223.
Bazdahi 131.
Bazigh (ibn Musa) 64; 64 n.
Bazighiyya 64; 64 n; 65 n.
Becker, Carl 38 n.
Beirut 160 n.
Bekr al-A'war al-Hejari 55; 58 n.
Berbers 123.
Berend 114; 114 n.
Beyan, A. 91 n; 117 n.
Bi'ar al-Ridwan 167; 167 n.
Bishr b. Ghayath b. Abu Karima al-Marisi or al-Marisi 5; 5 n; 34 n.
Bishr b. al-Mu'tamar 195.
Blochet 110 n.
Blue, Irvin 220 n.
Brockelmann, Carl 120 n; 157 n; 175 n;
223 n.
Browne, E. G. 117 n.
Budasaf 200 n.
Buddha 200 n.
Buddhist 118 n.
Bugha al-Kalun 88 n.
Bukhara 76 n.
al-Bukhari 192 n.
Bukhanassar 92.
Burguthiyya 11.
Burquoy 107 n.
Buriyya 169.
Buwalids 122 n; 128.
Cadmus 220.
Cairo 107 n. 127.
Carnel, Battle of the 167; 168; 215 n.
Carra de Vaux 125 n.
Casarova 108 n.
China 122.
Chwolson, D. 103 n; 133 n.
Christ 99; 100.
Dabba, Bann 215.
Dahriyya (see Materialists) 22; 107; 219.
Dallam, Dallamites 112; 112 n; 114.
Daisan 201.
Daisanites 179 n; 223;
Dallah 124 n;
Damasus 16 n; 69 n; 78; 124; 124 n.
Damin 154 n; 155 n; 156 n; 157 n.
Daniel 92.
Daud-al-Jawardi 33; 33 n; 183; 183 n;
Daughters of God 219.
Day of Judgement 27.
Dedering, Sven 2 n.
De Lacy O'Leary 142 n.
De Goeje, M. J. 88 n; 110 n; 111 n; 119 n;
121 n; 126 n; 214 n;
De Sacy 111 n; 138 n.
Dhaidhan, Muhammad b. Hussain 108; 108 n;
109; 109 n.
Dhamniyya 40; 67; 68-9; 70 n.
Dhimnis 222 n; 223; 223 n.
Dindan (Ahmad b. al-Husain) 109 n.

Dhar ibn Amir, 10 n; 16-17; 16 n; 189;
 211 n.
 Dharriyya 16-17; 39; 169; 211; 225.
 Djeneby 107 n.

E.

Eden, Garden of 141.
 Egypt 4 n; 5 n; 53 n; 54 n; 108 n; 112;
 112 n; 127; 127 n; 128; 129.
 Euphrates 49 n; 124 n; 157.
 Empedocles 220.

F.

Fael al Hadathi 99; 99 n; 100.
 Fakhr al-Dawla al-Buwalhi 140 n.
 Fakhr al-Din al-Razi 47 n; 106 n.
 Fakhr al-Din al-Razi 47 n; 106 n.
 Fakhruddin b. Buwalhi, Abu Shuja, Adud al-
 Daula 128; 128 n; 129.
 Farafana 127 n.
 Fars al-Dinwari 82.
 Al-Farra, Abu Zakariya Yahya b. Ziyad al-
 Dailami 199; 199 n.
 Fars 59 n; 60; 78; 80; 82; 112.
 Fark 134; 134 n; 135 n.
 Fatima 51 n; 61 n; 70; 70 n; 74; 111 n.

G.

Gabriel 199 n.
 Gaudetroy-Demombynes 133 n.
 Ganges River 122 n.
 Gayomart 199.
 Gedenna 210.
 Ghailan, Merwan or Abu Merwan 1; 1 n;
 6; 6 n; 7.
 Gharistan 18.
 Gharjubar 18 n.
 Ghassan 3; 4; 4 n.
 Ghassariyya 1; 3; 5.
 Ghazali 20 n; 100 n; 115 n; 135 n; 138 n;
 143 n; 165 n; 183 n; 188 n; 189 n;
 190 n; 191 n; 203 n; 209 n; 211 n.
 Ghazna 18 n; 76 n; 107; 122 n; 130.
 Ghaznavid 129 n.
 Ghazal 43.
 Ghutai 31; 31 n; 41; 46; 46 n; 49; 56 n;
 70; 73; 83 n; 91; 103 n; 105 n; 107 n;
 140; 164; 169; 183; 204; 223; 226 n.
 Ghurabiyya 40; 67-8; 67 n; 69 n.
 Gileshah, 200 v. Garshah.

God's greatest Name (al-Ism al-A'ham) 47;
 47 n; 50; 50 n; 54.
 Goldzher, Ignaz 2 n; 15 n; 20 n; 26 n;
 51 n; 57 n; 58 n; 62 n; 71 n; 76 n;
 81 n; 92 n; 100 n; 101 n; 104 n; 123 n;

H.

Habir 123.
 Hafid al-Fard 16.
 Hafiz Ghulam Sarwar 137 n.
 Haidiyya 34; 34 n; 40; 90-100; 185.
 Hajjar 121; 121 n; 123; 161 n.
 Hajir 54.
 Hajj 119; 176 n.
 al-Hajaj b. Ilat 165 n.
 Hakaikiyya 18.
 Hakamiyya 32 n.
 Hallaj, Abu-l-Mughith al-Husain b. Mansur
 73; 80-84; 80; 80 n; 81; 81 n; 82;
 82 n; 82; 83 n; 84; 84 n; 86 n.
 Hallajiyya 73; 78 n; 80-84; 224.
 Hamadan 20 n.
 Hamid b. al-Abbas, Abu Muhammad 84; 84 n.
 Hamza Ispahani 126 n.
 Hanafiyya 4 n.
 Hanbalites 20 n.
 Hanifa, Bann 98; 142; 225; 228.
 Hanifiyya: Hanifites 1 n; 2 n; 4 n; 5 n; 219 n;
 222 n.
 Harbiyya 40; 56; 59 n.
 al-Harith b. Miskin 226.
 Harith b. Asad al-Muhassibi, Abu Abdallah
 225.
 Harith b. Suraj 13 n; 14; 14 n.
 Harun 109; 109 n; 123; 124 n; 131; 222 n.
 Harun b. Khumarawail, Abu Musa 124 n.
 Harun al-Rashid 5 n; 54 n; 117; 117 n;
 118 n.
 Hasen al Askari 70 n.
 al-Hasan b. al-Hasan 229.
 al-Hasan b. Muhammad (or al-Fadi) al-Za-farani 11 n.
 al-Hasan b. Sanbar 111 n.
 Hashim, Bann 61 n.
 al-Hawb 215 n.
 Heffening 223 n.
 Heligopolus 119 n.
 Herat 18 n; 43; 73; 103; 142 n; 161 n.
 Hermes 133; 133 n.
 al-Hilli 177 n; 191 n.
 Himadiyya 40 n; see Himariyya.
 Himariyya 39; 40; 101-2; 101 n.
 Himyarite 152.
 Hindoo 16 n; 65 n; 91 n; 209 n.
 Hisham (Caliph) 47 n.
 Hisham al-Hakam 14 n.
 Hisham b. Abd-al-Malik 101 n; 102 n.
 Hisham al-Fuwati 188 n.
 Hisham ibn al-Hakam al-Rafdi 32; 33 n;
 183; 188 n.
 Hisham b. Muhammad 211 n.
 Hisham ibn Salim al-Jawalki or Juwalki 33;
 33 n; 183.
 Hisham b. Ubaidallah al-Razi 226.
 Hishamiyya 19 n; 32; 33; 184; 202; 225.

- Hit 121; 121 n; 126; 126 n.
 Hint 39 n.
 Horren, M. 6 n; 91 n; 93 n.
 Housma, T. 81 n.
 Huart Cl. 110 n.
 Hudaira ibn Jubair 43 n.
 al-Hudaidiya 167 n; 218; 228.
 Huhmaniyya 32; 73; 78-80; 79.
 Huhul 73 n.
 Hulufiya 32; 39; 40; 47; 56; 73-86; 74;
 78; 79; 80; 81 n; 83; 109; 164; 169;
 183 n; 219; 224.
 Humaid b. Thaur 135.
 Huramiyya 107 n.
 Hurkus b. Zahair al-Bajali 212.
 Husain b. Abu Mansur 58 n.
 Husain (Ibn Ali) 45; 45 n; 49; 51 n; 55;
 60 n; 62; 62 n; 70; 74; 229.
 Husain al-Ahwazi 110 n.
 Husain b. Ali b. al-Hasan b. Ali 53 n.
 al-Husain b. al-Fadl 201.
 Husain b. al-Kasim b. Ubaidallah b. Sulaiman
 b. Sahb, abu Ali 85; 85 n; 86.
 Husain b. Zikrawah b. Mithrawah 124; 124 n.
 Husamiyya 9 n.
 I.
 Ibn Masarra 47 n.
 Ibn Muklah 85 n.
 Ibn Rawandi 6; 14 n; 188 n.
 Ibn Salim al-Basri 189.
 Ibn Zikrawah 110 n.
 Ibrahim 76; 144; 145.
 Ibrahim b. Abdallah b. al-Hasan b. al-Hasan 53.
 Ibrahim b. Ahmad al-Marwazi, Abu Ishak
 224; 224 n.
 Ibrahim b. Muthafir 21; 21 n; 28.
 Ibrahim b. Muhammad b. al-Munajjim, Abu
 Imran 85; 85 n.
 Ibrahim b. Muhammad al-Murakki, Abu Ishak
 126; 126 n.
 Ibrahim al-Nasrabi, Abu al-Kasim 82; 82 n.
 Ibrahim b. Yahya al-Aslami 34; 34 n.
 Ibrahimiyya 34.
 Idris 133 n.
 Idris b. Abdallah b. al-Hasan 53; 53 n.
 al-Iji 136 n; 144 n; 145 n.
 Iji, Bann 58 n; 65 n.
 Ikshidiyya 127.

- Ikhwān al-Safa 146 n.
 Ilak, 76; 78.
 Ilha or Ulla 69 n.
 Imamiyya or Imami 33; 39; 41 n; 44 n;
 45; 49 n; 57 n; 107 n; 134 n; 140;
 169; 213 n; 225.
 India 122; 122 n; 130.
 Irak 46 n; 47; 47 n; 54; 58; 58 n; 109;
 109 n; 110 n; 128 n.
 Iranian 50 n; 199 n.
 Irtja 2; 2 n.
 Isa al-Ispahani 37 n.
 Isa b. Maryam 34; 42; 45; 58 n; 68; 72; 88;
 99; 100; 186; 144; 145; 185; 200.
 Isa b. Muhammad b. Ali 88 n.
 Isa b. Musa 32; 53.
 Isaac son of Abraham 43 n.
 Isawiyya 37; 104.
 Ishak b. Ibrahim 88; 89 n; 115; 115 n.
 Ishak Sinjari 113 n.
 Ishak b. Suwaid al-Adawi 43; 43 n.
 Ishak the Turk 75 n.
 Ishakiyya 18; 75 n; 89 n.
 Ishmael 134 n.
 Isma'il b. Abbad al-Sahib 140; 140 n.
 Isma'il b. Ibrahim b. Kabus al-Shirazi al-Daili 14.
 Isma'il b. Ja'far al-Sadik 109; 110 n.
 Isma'iliyya 107 9; 109; 112 n; 117 n; 146 n.
 Ispahan 59 n; 60; 61; 61 n; 107 n.
 Ithnashariyya 62 n.
 Ivanow V. 116 n.
 J.
 Jamshid or Jimsid 219; 219 n.
 Janadi 123 n.
 al-Jamabi, Abu al-Kasim Said 111 n.
 Janahiyya 39; 40; 59-61; 64 n; 65; 73; 74;
 92; 93; 169; 204; 224.
 Japhet b. Ali 37 n.
 Jarhamiyya 152.
 Jarudiyya 169; 225.
 Jawahikiyya 19 n.
 Jawidan b. Sahruk 88.
 Jerusalem 18 n.
 Jesus 3 n; 42 n; 200 n.
 Jewish, Jews 5 n; 19 n; 38; 41 n; 42; 43;
 44 n; 45; 45 n; 47 n; 51 n; 67; 68;
 92; 104; 107; 134 n; 136; 139; 141 n;
 152; 172 n; 182 n; 184 n; 185 n; 200;
 200 n; 221; 221 n; 222.
 Jibril or Jibrail 46; 47; 47 n; 68; 75.
 Finn 133 n; 135.
 Joshua or Yusha b. Nun 44 n; 45.

al-Jubba'i 35; 93; 182; 188; 191. al-Jumaid 82; 82 n.
Jupiter 120; 121.

Jurjan 89; 107 n; 112 n; 115; 129; 129 n.
al-Jurjan, Sawad 90.
Justin Martyr 90 n.

K.

Ka'ba 38; 39; 117; 121; 148; 200.
al-Ka'bi 37; 197 n.
Kabus b. Wasmukir, Shams al-Malah 129;
129 n.
Kadrites 6 n; 9; 10; 14; 25; 27; 34; 39;
43; 91; 98; 98 n; 94; 99; 101; 105;
159; 162; 164; 166; 168; 169; 170; 177;
182; 184 n; 185; 186; 187; 187 n; 188;
189; 190; 193; 194; 195; 196; 197; 198;
198 n; 199; 201; 203; 204; 204 n; 208;
209; 210 n; 225; 226; 229.
al-Kaddah, Abdallah b. Maimun 89 n; 101 n;
108; 108 n; 109; 109 n; 111 n; 124 n.
al-Kaddah, Ahmad b. Abdallah b. Maimun
110 n; 112 n.
al-Kadiri Bilal 85 n; 122 n.
Kahir al-Falak 127 n.
Kahramiya 132.
Kairuan 121; 123; 127.
Kais, Bannu 142 n.
Kaisaniyya 56 n.
al-Kalanisi 217.
Kamiliya 169; 214 n; 224; 228.
Kannawj 122.
Kantar al-Muhannira 89.
al-Karabisi, al-Husain b. Ali 106; 106 n.
Karates 37 n.
Karbela 45; 45 n; 55.
Karmat, Hamdan 108 n; 110; 110 n; 111;
111 n; 112; 112 n.
Karaman, Karamita 32 n; 101 n; 107 n;
109 n; 110 n; 111; 112; 114; 120; 120 n;
Khawaf 221 n.

121 n; 123 n; 124 n; 125; 125 n; 126;
127 n; 134 n.
Karramiyya 1 n; 2 n; 18 ff; 18 n; 19 n;
20 n; 21; 22; 23; 25; 26; 27; 28; 29;
30; 34; 35; 37; 139 n; 183; 184; 186;
191; 193 n; 201 n; 203 n; 216; 217.
Kashsh 77; 77 n.
al-Kasim b. Isa al-Jili, Abu Dulaf 88; 114.
al-Katif 123; 127 n.
Kawakimardan 75 n; see Kaza Kaimun Dat.
Kaza Kaimun Dat 75; 75 n.
Kein 2 n.
Kessler 91 n.
Khalefy 107 n.
Khalid b. Abdallah al-Kasri 46 n; 47; 48 n;
52; 58 n; 101; 102 n.
Khalid b. al-Walid 223; 223 n.
al-Khalil b. Ahmad 161; 161 n.
al-Khalij 76; 77.
al-Kharaka 166.
al-Khasibi 125 n.
Khatabiyya 32; 39; 40; 62; 63 n; 65; 70;
73; 74; 92; 93; 93; 140; 169; 201; 224;
226.
Khawarij, Kharij, Kharijite 1 n; 5 n; 15 n;
27; 39; 42; 42 n; 43; 45 n; 94 n; 103;
105; 105 n; 152 n; 159; 162; 164; 168;
169; 170; 174; 176; 177; 205; 207; 207 n;
209; 210 n; 211; 213 n; 214 n; 216;
224; 225; 291.
Khawla al-Hanafiyya 225.
Khawaf 221 n.

ibn al-Khayyat 14 n; 188 n; 204 n.
Kharas 35; 121.
Khar 103 n.

Kinda, Bannu 38; 58 n; 228.
Kirkisani 104 n.
al-Kirmani 2 n.

Khurasan 13 n; 14 n; 18; 18 n; 29; 60 n;
80; 94 n; 110 n; 113 n; 129; 129 n;
130; 142; 142 n; 161 n.
Khurram (geogr) 87 n.
Khurrama 87 n.
Khurramiyya 87 (see Khurramiyya); 107 n;
220.
Khurramiyya 73; 87-89; 87 n; 89 n; 95 n;
107 n; 109 n; 114; 114 n; 143; 200;
206.
Khuzaima, Bannu 211.
Khuzaima b. Thabit 168; 168 n.
Khuzistan 101 n; 109 n.
Khwarezm 129.
Kinana 211.

Kufa 5 n; 16 n; 32 n; 42 n; 44; 45 n; 49 n;
53; 53 n; 55; 57 n; 59; 59 n; 63; 63 n;
65 n; 107 n; 124 n; 125; 126; 126 n;
127; 160 n; 161 n.
al-Kufa, Sawad 110 n.
Kuffie 3 n; 41; 53 n; 64 n.
Kuma 69 n; 109 n.
Kur 80 n.
Kurash 43 n; 208 n; 210 n; 211; 211 n;
212; 212 n; 218 n; 219.
Kurds 109; 141.
Kushayr, Bannu 228.
Kushasp 119.
Kutama 123.
Kuzman 218; 218 n; 228.

L.

Lahza 107 n.
Lamghan 122; 122 n.

Lane, E. 75 n; 154 n.

M.

Mahadd 142 n; 211; 211 n.
Mahadd al-Mutiz, Abu Tamim 127 n.
Mahan b. Zayda 94; 94 n.
Ma'ghreb 53; 53 n; 107 n; 109; 112; 123.
Magians 22 n; 68; 100; 102; 105; 106; 107;
115; 116; 117; 118; 119; 120; 122; 123;
130; 131; 132; 141; 148; 149; 183; 184;
185; 199; 200 n; 220; 221; 221 n; 223;
227.
Mahdi 23; 49; 54; 54 n; 57 n; 58 n; 61 n;
119 n; 120.
Al-Mahdi b. Mansur 76; 77; 77 n; 160 n.
Mahmud b. Subuktekin, Yamin al-Daula Amin
Maktas 20 n; 160 n; 219 n.

al-Milla 21 n; 122; 122 n; 125 n; 129;
130; 130 n.
Maimun b. Daisan 108 n; 112 n; 123 n; 124;
131.
Maimun b. Khalid or b. Amran 105; 105 n.
Maimuniyya 39; 40; 105-6; 112 n; 224.
Makan 54 n.
Makridi 1 n; 5 n; 62 n; 64 n; 65 n; 75 n;
97 n; 99 n; 108 n; 112 n.
Malik b. Anas 4 n; 20 n; 24 n; 86 n; 159 n;
160; 165 n; 219; 221; 222 n; 223; 223 n;
224 n; 226; 228 n.
Maktas 20 n; 160 n; 219 n.

- Malkut 64 n.
 Ma'inar b. al-Nuthanna, Abu Ubaida 152;
 152 n.; 153; 153 n.
 Al-Ma'mun 130 n.
 Al-Ma'mun, Caliph 88 n.; 89 n.; 101 n.; 108;
 113; 142 n.; 226 n.
 Al-Ma'mun akhu Karimat 112; 112 n.
 Ma'muniyya 112; 112 n.
 Manat 26.
 Mawwiya 91; 91 n.; 200; 223. (see Mani-cheans).
 Mani 92; 201.
 Manicheans 19 n.; 42 n.; 91 n.; 94; 179 n.;
 200 n.
 Al-Mansur (Fatimid Caliph) 126 n.
 Al-Mansur, Abu Ja'far 52; 52 n.; 53; 53 n.; 54; 63; 63 n.; 75; 75 n.; 94; 94 n.;
 103 n.
 Mansur b. Nuh ibn Samanid 190 n.
 Mansuriyya 31; 39; 40; 57-8; 64 n.; 65;
 140; 169; 204; 224.
 Marcion 201.
 Marcionites or Markunites 179 n.; 223.
 Marisiyya 1; 2 n.; 5.
 Marissa 5 n.
 Mars 121; 127.
 Mars 121 n.
 Marut 217 n.
 Al-Maryudi or Mervezy, Husin b. Ali 113.
 Mary, mother of Jesus 191.
 Masamiya 123.
 Mashkiyya 220 n. (see Masikhiyya).
 Maslama 38 n.
 Massignon, L. 62 n.; 63 n.; 80 n.; 81 n.; 82 n.;
 83 n.; 84 n.; 109 n.; 112 n.; 113 n.; 116 n.;
 118 n.; 131 n.; 132 n.
 Masikhiyya 220; 220 n.; 221.
 Mas'udi 126 n.
 Materialists 131; 132; 136; 131; 173; 179;
 180; 181. (see Dahiriyya).
 Maturidi, pseudo — 80 n.; 201 n.
 Ma-wara-i-nahr 32; 75; 75 n.; 76 n.; 107 n.; 113.
 Mazdak 87 n.; 113 n.; 114; 201.
 Masdakiyya 87; 179 n.; 221.
 Al-Mazini, Jahn b. Khalaf 161; 161 n.
 Mazfar, Muhammad b. Karen 89; 89 n.; 90;
 115.
 Mazariyya 88; 89; 90; 90 n.
 Mecca 11; 33 n.; 53; 54; 121; 126; 126 n.;
 127; 148; 161 n.; 228.
 Al-Medina 32; 53; 53 n.; 54; 59; 141; 161 n.; 165; 225.
 Merv 73; 74; 75; 75 n.
 Mervan b. al-Hakam 214; 214 n.
 Mervan b. Muhammad al-Himar 101 n.
 Mesopotamia 123; 125.
 Mithraiah b. Zikrath 110 n.
 Mikail or Mikail 64; 68; 75.
 Mifniyya 68 n.
 Monotheists 181.
 Moses 44 n.; 45; 134 n.; 136; 189 n.; 200.
 Mu'adh b. Jabal 225; 225 n.
 Mu'adh b. Muslim 77; 77 n.
 Mu'adhyya 2 n.
 Mu'ammir 24; 187; 195.
 Mu'ammir 63; 63 n.;
 Mu'ammir b. Abbad al-Sulami 63 n.
 Mu'ammariyya 63; 64 n.
 Mu'awiya b. Abdallah b. Ja'far 59 n.
 Mu'awiya b. Su'fyan 27; 70 n.; 140; 168;
 214 n.; 245; 245 n.; 225 n.
 Mu'barak, maula of Isma'il 110 n.
 Mu'barakiyya 110 n.
 Mu'barek 110 n.
 Mu'barek 107 n.
 Mu'bayyida 75; 76; 107 n.; 206; 224.

- Mudar 142; 142 n.; 143; 211.
 Mudrika, Bann 211.
 Mudaddal al-Sairafi 65.
 Mudadaliyya 65.
 Mu'awwida or Mu'awwidiyya 40; 40 n.; 67;
 68; 68 n.; 185.
 Muflith 125 n.
 Muflitha b. Sa'id al-Ijli 31; 47 n.; 48 n.; 49;
 49 n.; 50 n.; 51 n.; 52; 52 n.; 54; 54 n.;
 55; 57 n.; 58 n.; 59.
 Mughithiya 31; 39; 40; 49; 50 n.; 54; 54 n.;
 59; 60 n.; 140; 169; 233; 201; 223.
 Muhammad 2; 3 n.; 12; 12 n.; 26; 26 n.; 37;
 37 n.; 38; 39; 42 n.; 43; 44 n.; 46; 49;
 51; 51 n.; 52 n.; 58 n.; 59 n.; 63; 64;
 67; 67 n.; 68; 69; 70; 76; 81 n.; 90;
 103; 104; 120; 128; 134 n.; 135 n.; 136 n.;
 140; 141; 142; 142 n.; 143 n.; 145; 167 n.;
 190 n.; 199; 200; 203 n.; 204; 213 n.;
 214 n.
 Muhammad b. Abdallah b. Ma'mun 111 n.
 Muhammad b. Abdallah b. al-Hasan b. Ali
 49; 49 n.; 50; 50 n.; 52; 52 n.; 53; 53 n.;
 54; 55; 55 n.
 Muhammad b. Abdallah b. Tahir 18 n.
 Muhammad b. Ahmad al-Kahabi 93; 98;
 98 n.
 Muhammad b. Ali (b. Abdallah b. al-Abbas)
 74; 74 n.
 Muhammad b. Ali b. Husain al-Bakir, Abu
 Ja'far 46 n.; 47 n.; 49 n.; 50 n.; 57; 57 n.; 229.
 Muhammad b. Ali al-Shahghani al-Azaki.
 32; 73; 85; 85 n.; 86; 86 n.
 Muhammad b. al-Baith 88 n.
 Muhammad b. al-Hanafiyya 46; 50 n.; 60 n.;
 74; 74 n.; 225; 229.
 Muhammad b. al-Hasan 226.
 Muhammad b. al-Husain b. Dhihan Bakhter
 109 n.
 Muhammad b. Ibrahim b. Simjur, Abu-l-
 Hasan, Nasir al-Dawla 129.
 Muhammad b. Isa Bughuth 11.
 Muhammad b. Isma'il b. Ja'far 62; 107 n.;
 109; 110 n.; 128 n.; 134; 134 n.; 145.
 Muhammad b. Ja'far 19 n.
 Muhammad b. Karram 8 n.; 18; 19; 20; 21;
 22; 23; 24; 26 n.; 27; 28; 186 n.
 Muhammad b. Nu'man 19 n.
 Muhammad b. Shahib 1; 6; 6 n.; 7.
 Muhammad al-Shabani 3 n.
 Muhammad b. Sulaiman, Abu Ja'far 94; 94 n.
 Muhammad b. Sulaiman 124.
 Muhammad b. Tahir b. Abdallah b. Tahir 18;
 18 n.
 Muhammad b. Yusuf al-Thughri, Abu Sa'id
 88; 88 n.; 114.
 Muhammad Ali, Maulvi 137 n.
 Muhammadans 133 n.; 200 n.
 Muhammadidiyya 49 n.; 54.
 Muhammadidiyya 68 n.
 Muhammadira 88; 88 n.; 89; 107 n.; 115; 206;
 224.
 Muji'a 225 n.
 Mukallaf 207; 208.
 al-Mukanna, Hashim b. Hakim 32; 75; 75 n.;
 76; 76 n.; 77; 77 n.; 78.
 Mukanna'iyya 32; 40; 73; 75; 78; 224.
 Mukhar, Haradan 109; 109 n.
 al-Mukhrati Billahi, Ja'far 83; 84 n.; 85 n.; 120; 120 n.; 125 n.;
 al-Mukhrati 120; 120 n.; 124; 125.
 Muklan 130.
 Munkar 209 n.
 Mujiyya, Mujites 1; 1 n.; 2; 2n; 4 n.; 5;
 5 n.; 6; 7; 8; 13 n.; 82 n.; 87 n.; 229.

Musa 144; 145; 146; 146 n.
 Musa b. Ja'far al-Kahim 134 n; 229.
 Mus'ab 89 n.
 Musallima al-Kadhab 38; 45; 48; 53; 142;
 201; 201 n; 204; 225.
 Mushabbiha 31; 32; 33; 34; 36; 159 n;
 164.
 Mushkanīya 37 n; 38 n.
 Muslims 7; 15; 17; 32; 39; 44 n; 45; 48;
 57 n; 59 n; 114; 115; 121; 122; 130;
 133 n; 142 n; 148; 149; 150; 162; 171;
 200 n; 206; 208; 210; 213 n; 214 n;
 215; 216; 216 n; 218; 219; 220; 221;
 221 n; 222; 223; 223 n; 224 n; 225;
 226; 227.
 Mustadrika 11; 12.
 al-Mustatīn Billaḥi 18 n.
 Muṣṭamin 223; 223 n.

Muta 59 n.
 Muta 176; 177 n.
 al-Mu'tadid 124; 146 n.
 Mukallims 16 n; 159; 182 n; 185 n;
 al-Mu'tasim 88 n; 89; 89 n; 90; 113; 114.
 Mutazila, Mutazilites 4 n; 5 n; 6; 16; 16 n;
 20 n; 22; 24; 34; 35; 35 n; 36; 43 n;
 53; 53 n; 63 n; 81; 93; 101; 101 n;
 113 n; 177; 180; 180 n; 185; 185 n;
 186 n; 187; 187 n; 188; 188 n; 190 n;
 191; 191 n; 193 n; 194; 194 n; 195;
 195 n; 197 n; 198 n; 199 n; 202 n;
 203 n; 204 n; 210 n; 212; 217 n; 224;
 226.
 Mutaziliem 1 n; 34 n; 93; 94; 99;
 Mutazilite Kadāties 1.
 al-Mu'ti 128 n.
 al-Muzani 224 n.

N.

Nabateans 110 n; 141; 141 n.
 Nadr, Bann 211; 211 n.
 Naḡī' b. al-Azrak al-Hanafi 212.
 Nafs 116; 116 n.
 Nafs Zakiya 52 n; (see Muhammad b. Abdullah
 b. al-Hasan b. al-Hasan).
 Nāhawend 14 n.
 Nahrwan 214; 215.
 Najadat 176; 207 n.
 Najd 54 n.
 Najd al-Hajiz 54 n.
 Najda b. Amir 212.
 al-Najjar, al-Husain b. Muhammad Abu Ab-dalah 9; 9 n; 10 n; 11; 11 n; 16; 16 n.
 Najjariyya 1 n; 9; 10; 12; 39; 159; 164;
 169; 226; 229.
 Nakimara 53 n (see Bakimara)

Nakhsab 77.
 Nakits 134 n.
 Naktir 209 n.
 al-Namuti, Muhammad b. Nusair 70.
 Namuriyya 40; 70; 70 n; 73; 74.
 Nasaf 77 n; 119 n;
 al-Nasafi, Abu Abdullah Bandana 191 n.
 al-Nasafi, Muhammad b. Ahmad 113; 113 n.
 Nasir, Nawasib 42.
 Nasir al-Daula, Abu-l-Hasan Muhammad ibn
 Simjur 29.
 Nasir b. Ahmad the Samanid 113 n.
 Nasir b. al-Hajjaj 165; 165 n.
 Nasir ibn Sayyar 14; 14 n.
 Nasir b. Subuktekin 130 n.
 Nask 134; 134 n; 135 n;
 Naubakhi 19 n; 46 n; 54 n; 57 n; 58 n;

61 n; 62 n; 63 n; 64 n; 75 n; 110 n;
 212 n.
 al-Nawawī 64 n; 160 n; 165 n; 173 n; 192 n;
 al-Nazzam 6 n; 7 n; 9 n; 10 n; 15; 34; 35;
 93; 93 n; 99; 164; 166; 177; 178;
 178; 179 n; 180 n; 204; 204 n; 205 n.
 Nimrud b. Kanāzan b. Kūsh 219.
 Nishapur 18; 18 n; 21; 82; 103; 113; 113 n;
 126; 129 n; 130; 221 n;
 Nizar 43 n; 142 n; 211.
 Noah 134 n.

O.

Omairiya 65.
 Omar (Aliq) 229.
 Omar b. Bayan al-Jih 65.
 Omar b. al-Khatrab 42 n; 51; 51 n; 52 n;
 Omar (b. Yusuf) al-Khannak 58 n.

P.

Paradise 132; 144 n; 160; 167; 181; 187; 197;
 217; 217 n; 228; 228 n.
 Pedersen 103 n.
 Persia 42 n; 103; 103 n; 112; 127 n.
 Persians 2 n; 103; 117 n; 119; 119 n; 120;
 120 n; 128 n; 136 n; 141; 142; 161 n;
 209 n; 211; 211 n; 219 n; 224.
 Peter 134 n.
 Pharaoh 136.
 Planets, Seven 116.
 Plato 92.
 Platarch 91.
 Pneumatics 26 n.
 Pomanski, S. 37 n.
 Prophet 31 n; 161; 164; 164 n; 165; 166 n;
 168; 170; 175; 179; 196; 204 n; 209;
 210; 211 n; 212; 213; 214 n; 215; 215 n;
 217 n; 218; 218 n; 223 n; 228.
 Pythagoras 220.

R.

Rabiz, Bann 142; 142 n; 212.
 Rabiyya 64 n.
 al-Radi b. al-Mukadir 85; 85 n;
 Rafida, Rafidites, Rawad 36; 39; 42 n; 43;
 43 n; 45; 49; 54 n; 68; 70; 71; 71 n;
 73; 92; 93; 94; 95; 140; 159; 162;
 al-Rai 9 n; 11; 12; 87 n; 107 n; 113 n.

Rakashiyra 2 n.
 Rakka 124; 124 n; 125 n.
 Ramadan, Fast of 39; 90; 204; 205.
 al-Ramlah 124; 124 n; 125.
 Rawa 221 n.
 Ravandiya 75 n; 92; 93; 94 n; 107 n; 213.
 Rayaniya 104.
 al-Razi 185 n; 186 n.

Ridda 98 n.
 Ritter, H. 46 n.
 Romans 119; 120.
 Rukn al-Karba 54.
 Rusafa 124.
 Ruzam b. Sabik. 74 n.
 Ruzaniya or Rizaniya 40; 73; 73 n; 74;
 75 n; 92 n; 224.

S.
 Sadya b. Joseph al-Fayyumi 172 n; 182 n;
 185 n.
 Sababiyra 31; 39; 40; 41-45; 55; 73; 74;
 93; 140; 169; 201; 223.
 Sabaiyya 41 n; (see Sababiyra)
 Sabbath 20 n; 196.
 Sabbat al-Madain 42; 44.
 Sabians 103; 103 n; 131; 133; 133 n; 200 n;
 221; 222; 222 n.
 Sabiyra 107 n; 134 n.
 Sechan, Edw. 113 n; 119 n.
 Said b. Abu Wakas 217 n; 218.
 Said b. Malik 217 n.
 Saegitarus 120.
 Said b. Amr al-Harashi 77; 77 n.
 Said al-Hasan b. Ahmad b. Abdallah al-
 Kaddah 111; 111 n.
 Said b. Zaid b. Nufail 217 n; 218.
 Saigy 107 n.
 Saijah b. Harith al-Tamim 201; 201 n; 204.
 Salih Kubba 1 n; 6; 8; (see al-Salih).
 Salih b. Mudrik 60 n.
 al-Salih 8; 190; 190 n.
 Salmiyra 78 n; 81; 81 n.
 Salsbury Fragment 116 n.
 Salm b. Ahwaz al-Mazini 14; 14 n.
 Salm al-Khasir 199 n.

Salm b. Kulaiba 53.
 al-Sam'ani 53 n; 62 n; 119 n.
 Samanids 29; 129 n; 130.
 Samara 3.
 Samarra 89 n.
 Samaritans 222.
 Samarkand 42 n.
 Sam'a 43 n; 123 n.
 al-Sanadiki, al-Hasan b. Faraj, Abu-l-Kasim
 123; 123 n; 124 n.
 Sanbar 126 n.
 Sanbar, Banu 111.
 Sasaniids 120 n.
 Sasaniyya 220 n.
 Satan 22 n; 26; 54; 55; 68; 75; 100; 102;
 115; 183; 183 n; 185; 189 n; 148; 183;
 184; 185; 208; 208 n; 219.
 Saturn 120 n; 121; 219 n.
 al-Sawad 128.
 Sawda' 41 n.
 Scandianan 30 n.
 Schacht, J. 172 n.
 Schreiner, M. 37 n; 97 n; 98 n.
 Seleucids 120 n.
 Sem 134 n.
 Seth 134 n.
 Shaban, month of 205.

Shabib b. Yazid al-Shabani 1 n; 212.
 Shadkaniiya or Shadghaniyya 87; 37 n;
 38 n; 104 n.
 al-Shafi' 4 n; 6 n; 34 n; 63 n; 160 n; 192 n;
 219 n; 221; 222; 223; 223 n; 224; 224 n;
 225; 225 n; 226.
 Shafites 224; 225 n.
 Shahrasani 4 n; 103 n; 115 n; 116 n.
 al-Shaitan 183 n.
 Shaitan al-Tak 19.
 Shalmaghan 85 n.
 Shammakh 54 n.
 al-Sharani, Abu Sa'id 113; 113 n.
 Sharwin 89; 90.
 Shash 76.
 Shawwal, month of 205.
 Shem Hamforash 47 n.
 Shi'a, Shiite 2 n; 35 n; 44 n; 46 n; 49 n;
 51; 51 n; 52 n; 55 n; 58 n; 62 n; 64 n;
 71 n; 83 n; 93 n; 111 n; 128 n; 134 n;
 140 n; 160 n; 175 n; 177 n; 201 n;
 209 n; 210 n; 211 n; 212 n; 213 n.
 Shihir 105; 105 n.
 Shiraz 80 n.
 Shit (Seih) 60.
 Shraman 91 n.
 Shurath b. al-Harith 14 (see al-Harith b.
 Surath).
 al-Shurafi 70.
 Shuraiyya 40; 70; 73; 74.
 Shuramain or Suramain 18; 18 n;
 Shu'ubiyra 141 n; 152 n; 212 n.
 Shiwaihi, Amr b. Uthman b. Kanbar 161; 161 n.

Sifaiyya 5; 6; 159; 159 n. 161; 164.
 Siffin, Battle of 214; 215; 228 n.
 Sijistan 18; 18 n; 113 n.
 Siyam, Mt. 77.
 Snouck Hurgronje 176 n.
 Socrates 92; 180 n.
 Sophists 172; 172 n; 219.
 Surothmann, R. 54 n; 116 n; 160 n.
 Subuk 124; 124 n.
 Subuk al-Mufithi 125.
 Subuktekin 125 n; 130.
 Sufi 41 n; 47 n; 78 n; 80; 81; 82; 82 n;
 84; 150 n; 162; 163; 201 n; 225 n.
 al-Sugbd 76; 76 n; 77.
 Sulaiman b. al-Hasan al-Karnati, Abu Tahir
 111 n; 118; 118 n; 119 n; 120; 120 n;
 125; 125 n; 126; 126 n; 127; 132; 135;
 136; 137.
 Sulaiman b. al-Jarir al-Zaidi 54.
 Sulaimaniyya 169.
 Sumaniyya 91; 91 n; 174; 219.
 Sunday 196.
 Sumna 144.
 Sunnites 6 n; 7; 15; 18 n; 27; 28; 39; 44;
 51 n; 55 n; 58 n; 62 n; 123 n; 127 n;
 128 n; 134 n; 160 n; 176 n; 186; 190;
 194; 210 n; 211 n; 213 n; 215 n; 225
 Sunniye Mu'jile 4 n.
 Sunniye Unfartan 39.
 Surra-man-raa 89; 90; 114.
 Syria 41; 107 n; 110 n; 124 n; 160 n.
 Syrians 44.

T.
 Tabaristan 89; 90 n; 115; 129 n; 224.
 Takiya 62 n.
 Taiyus 193.
 Talha 15; 15 n; 38 n; 55; 60; 105; 167
 168; 214; 214 n; 215; 218.
 Talikan 80; 81 n.

Talimiyā 107 n.
 Tamim, Bann 38; 46 n; 201 n.
 Tanasikh 46 n; 60 n; 64; 70 n.
 Tanja 58 n.
 Tarākiyya 18.
 Tarsus 161 n.
 Tasmiyya 132.
 Tatar 122.
 Tatus 133 n.
 Tawatur 174; 175; 177.
 Tawariyya 59 n.
 Tem, Bann 140; 140 n; 141.
 Thamud 141.
 Thanawiyya 223; see Dualists;
 Tharwaih 130.
 Theuban 1 n; 5.
 Theubaniyya 1; 5.
 al-Thauri, Sufyan b. Sa'id b. Masruh 160;
 160 n; 164 n; 221.

U.

Ubai ibn Ka'b 16; 16 n.
 Ubaid ibn Zurara (b. A'yun?) 33 n.
 Ubaidallah b. Hasan b. Muhammad b. Isma'il
 110 n; 111; 112 n; 123; 123 n; 125 n;
 127; 127 n; 132; 135.
 Ubaidiyya 2 n.
 Ubad, Battle of 168; 218; 228.
 Ukail, Bann 127 n.
 Ukkasha b. Mithan 218; 228.
 Ulyan b. Dhira' al-Sadusi or al-Asadi 69 n.
 Ulyaniyya 68 n; 69 n.
 Umar b. Abu A'iff al-Azdi 47 n.

V.

Van Vloten 2 n; 57 n; 58 n; 87 n.
 Venus 47.
 Veth, P. J. 58 n.
 Vishlaspa 119 n.

Wadi Siba 214.
 Waidiyya 2 n.
 al-Walid 47 n.
 Wallia 53 n; 54 n.
 Walis 133; 133 n.

W.

Wasil ibn Ata 43 n; 167; 168.
 Wasit 85 n; 103.
 Wellhausen, J. 46 n.
 Wensinck 133 n; 175 n.
 Wüstenfeld 110 n; 111 n.

Y.

Yahya (b. Abdallah) b. al-Hasan 53 n.
 Yahya b. Aktham 226.
 Yahya b. al-Mahdi 111 n.
 Yahya b. Zikrawih b. Mithrawih, Abu-l-Kasim
 124; 124 n.
 Yakin 33 n.
 al-Yakubi 225 n.
 Yakut 129 n; 140 n.
 Yazdan 22 n; 117; 117 n; 131; 185.
 Yemen 94 n; 123; 123 n; 124 n; 222 n.
 Yemenite 142 n.
 Yezid I 45 n.
 Yezid b. Abu Unaisa 103-4; 103 n; 201;
 201 n.
 Yezid b. Mervan 103 n.
 Yezid b. Omar b. Hubaira 65 n.
 Yezidiyya 39; 40; 103-4; 105 n; 224.
 Yudasaf 200; 220 n.
 Yüdehan (al-Ra'i) 104 n.
 Yüdehaniyya 37 n; 38 n; 104 n.
 Yunus b. Abd al-Rahman al-Kunmi 33.
 Yunus ibn Aun 3; 3 n; 8 n.
 Yunus ibn Umar see Yunus ibn Aun.
 Yunusiyya 1; 1 n; 3; 4; 5; 6 n; 33.
 Yusuf b. Diwidad b. Abi Sa'i, Abu-l-Kasim 125;
 125 n.
 Yusuf b. Omar al-Thakafi 58.

Z.

Zabaniyya 217.
 Zafaraniyya 11; 11 n.
 Zahrite 20 n; 160; 173.
 Zaidan 108 n; see Dhaiddan.
 Zaidiyya 39; 71 n; 140; 160 n; 169; 213 n;
 217 n.
 Zakrouya b. Mahrouya Salmani 112 n.
 Zaradusht 119; 120; 122; 132; 200.
 Zarwan 220 n.
 Zarwaniyya 220; 220 n; 221.
 Zazem Well 121.
 Zandik 145; 149; 151; 226.
 Ziaids 129 n.
 Ziyadiyya 2 n.
 Zoroaster 119 n.
 Zoroastrianism 220 n.
 Zoroastrians 90 n; 118 n.
 al-Zubair 15; 15 n; 60; 103; 167; 168; 214;
 214 n; 215; 218.
 Zurara ibn A'yun al-Rafdi 35; 188.
 Zurariyya 35.
 Zurkan 7; 7 n.